For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

It will be within easy recollection that Mdme Sembrich made her most successful début at Covent Garden as the heroine of Lucia di Lammermoor. The triumph of that initial effort she sought to repeat on Thursday night, when her rentrée for the season was made. It is out of our power to say that the clever artist succeded, but we can suggest the reasons why she failed. In the first place, Mdme Sembrich is not now a new face and a new voice; wherefore the quidnuncs did not rush to see and hear. In the next place, Lucia has been so completely worn to rags and tatters by the constant use of its flimsy material that, lacking some fresh singer in the principal part, the public simply decline to attend. This explains the rather scanty audience of Thursday night, and also the absence of such enthusiastic demonstrations as attended Mdme Sembrich's first appearance. The artist, however, has not deteriorated. She sings as well as ever, displays the same facility of execution and range of voice, and exercises in full force qualities which anywhere and always must secure more than common distinction. We advise Mdme Sembrich to extend her repertory, if possible, in the direction of classic opera. She is, it appears, to play the Queen of Night in Die Zauberflöte, and the step is a wise one, to be followed, let us hope, by others of a similar kind. In any case she may be assured that the day when a prima donna could subsist in London upon a few showy parts, has passed never to return, It matters very little now who undertakes the male characters in Donizetti's opera, but we should add that Edgardo was represented by Signor Frapolli, in the absence of Signor Mierzwinsky, who was doubtless suffering from and repenting the imprudence of singing upon such a cold as he had on the opening night. Signor Pandolfini was a good Enrico, and Signor Silvestri an energetic Raimondo. Signor Bevignani conducted; the great ensemble of the contract scene being given under his direction with more than customary effect—enough, indeed to draw an encore from a solid house.

The opera on Saturday night was Gounod's Faust, to hear which the largest audience of the season, so far, gathered together, headed by the Prince and Princess of Wales. Time and change seem incapable of affecting the charm of this beautiful work, and for the phenomenon there are good reasons, needless of discussion here, though worth considering at a time when we are asked to accept something very different as the highest exemplification of lyric drama. A new Marguerite was to have appeared on Saturday night, in the person of Mdlle Olga Berghi, but the lady's name vanished from the bills at the last moment without reason being assigned. We may infer from this, and perhaps not be far wrong, that Mdlle Berghi, who is quite young, was tried, and found lacking in the experience necessary for an arduous part. In that case even her friends should applaud the postponement of her début till it can take place with less risk. Failing the new-comer, Mr Gye made use of the ever ready Mdme Valleria, who seems able to play anything and everything at the shortest notice. Mdme Valleria has long been familiar with the rôle of Marguerite, but the opportunity of appearing in it on the Covent Garden stage had never before come to her. Being come, she used it in a manner that must have surprised those of the audience who were not witnesses of her recent doings in Wagnerian opera. Mdme Valleria attempted little in the way of new development, such a course being hardly practicable, and decidedly dangerous, in the case of a character which so many gifted artists have combined to exhaust. But it was clear that she had made an intelligent study of Marguerite, and formed a definite conception to the task to be discharged. Hence there were no inequalities in the performance. The heroine's relation of the successive stages of the drama was clearly set forth, without undue effort and without leaving in the minds of witnesses a feeling of blankness and void. Mdme Valleria's impersonation could never be charged with lacking propriety. In the Jewel Scene, a natural and child-like delight with the baubles was as deftly exhibited as were, later on, the passion of love, the feeling of remorse, and an overwhelming sense of despair. Mdme Valleria's greatest success was made, perhaps, in the Church scene, throughout which she manifested a tragic power previously unsuspected. Of her singing it is needless to speak. That is always artistic, and animated by sympathetic qualities more than able to explain the encore awarded to the Jewel song. With a word of commendation for the Marta of Mdlle Ghiotti, and frank acknowledgment of the merit, not less surpassing than familiar, of Mdme Trebelli's Siebel, we come to a débutant in the person of M. Bouhy, whose continental fame was justified to the fullest extent by his impersonation of Mephistopheles. Mr Gye can be congratulated upon having secured a baritone-bass of marked distinction. True, M. Bouhy has been heard only in one part, but it is not rash to argue from one to all. The stamp of an artist is unmistakable, and the new Mephistopheles bore it as a knight of olden time bore his crest. M. Bouhy's performance was from first to last of finished excellence. He seems to have taken M. Faure for his model, both as actor and singer, the resemblance being occasionally striking in each respect. There were, however, certain points of dissimilarity; M. Bouhy inclining rather to the studied posturing of M. Petit, the Covent Garden Mephistopheles of some years ago, than to the less affected bearing of M. Faure. Comparisons aside, we have every reason to be satisfied with the new comer. The vibrato is rather prominent in his singing, but high qualities distinguish all he does, and his future appearances are already anticipated with interest. Signor Frapolli was a weak Faust, especially in the garden; Signor Cotogni impressed the audience deeply in Valentine's death scene; and M. Dupont, who had a warm greeting, presided with success over a performance which, taken for all in all, was not unworthy the traditions of the house.—D. T.

The Italian version of Rossini's Guillaume Tell was given here on Monday evening. This masterpiece of the great Italian composer (produced for the French stage) is seldom available for performance, owing to the difficulty of finding a competent representative of the character of Arnoldo, whose music was written for a light French tenor voice with an exceptionally high range, commanding the rare "ut de poitrine." Signor Mierzwinsky, who joined this establishment last season, proved his fitness for the part by his fine singing in it on the night of his début, and subsequently. Fine as his performance then was, it was transcended by that of Tuesday evening, when he produced an impression such as has scarcely been made in the part since the days of Duprez, and later of Mongini. Indeed, seldom, if ever, has there been the same combination of robust, resonant tone, possession of the extreme high chest notes, and command of mezza voce and expressive cantabile, as manifested by Signor Mierzwinsky in his latest performance. In the fine duet with Tell in the first act and its preliminary recitative, in the grand trio with Tell and Walter in the second act, and in the final scena with the martial solo "Corriam," the qualities above enumerated were manifested with signal success. Many points might be singled out for unqualified commendation, among others the excellent declamation of the opening recitative "Il mio giuro," of the passages in the trio in which Arnoldo's patriotism is aroused, and those expressive of his determination to rescue Tell. As instances of genuine pathos may be specified the delivery of the exquisite phrases "Ah, Mathilde" in the duet with Tell, and of those in the great trio expressive of Arnoldo's anguish at the violent death of his father. In the love duet with Mathilde Signor Mierzwinsky also sang finely—with excellent sostenuto, and tender expression without affectation. It was, indeed, throughout a performance of special excellence; and is particularly welcome as giving the possibility of hearing one of the grandest productions of genius in the whole range of stage music, and one that is—from the cause already referred to—far too seldom given. As before, the music of Mathilde was sung by Mdme Valleria with much grace and refinement. One or two interpolations in the romanza, "Selva opaca," might well have been dispensed with, as such music—unlike much of Rossini's—scarcely admits of, much less invites, varied readings. Mdlle Velmi, in the small part of Jemmy (Tell's son), sang brightly in the concerted music of the first act, and with genuine pathos in the leave-taking with Tell, in the scene of the shooting ordeal. Signor Cotogni, as Tell, again acted with real dramatic power, and sang impressively, particularly in the scene just specified, and the co-operation of Signor De Reszke, as Walter, was—as before—of high value, especially in the great trio, the cast having included Mdlle Ghiotti, as Eduige (Tell's wife); Signor Scolara, as Gessler; Signor Raguer, as Melchtal; and Signor I. Corsi, as the fisherman. The admirable orchestral details were finely rendered, and the chorus-singing was generally good, more especially in the first finale and in the great scene of the meeting of the four cantons. The overture was brilliantly played, and had to be repeated from the allegro. In the preceding movements the important obbligati for violoncello, corno Inglese, and flute were excellently rendered, respectively by Mr E. Howell, M. Castegnier, and Mr Radcliff. The scenic effects were of the splendour usual at this house, and the elaborate ballet action included the skilful dancing of the three Mdlles Reuters. The performance of the opera was ably conducted by M. Dupont, Mr Betjemann having wielded the bâton during the ballet music.—D. N.

FORM, OR DESIGN, IN VOCAL MUSIC.

Scena and Aria.

The scena and aria, first introduced by Weber, varies from the Italian form of that name, and returns greatly to the form of the Italian cantata, and especially to the more rhythmic kind used by Purcell.

There is in the Weber scena and aria less recitative than in the Italian, and a greater number of cantabile and complete movements; and at the same time the recitative is not massed together at the beginning of the scene, but interspersed between the different movements, thus tending to keep up the declamatory effect throughout the piece. Weber, in fact, acts up to the principle enunciated by Gluck in his preface to Alceste: "The proper function of music is to second poetry by enforcing the expression of the sentiment and the interest of the situation, without interrupting or weakening it by superfluous ornament."

The scena for tenor in Der Freischütz begins with, or is introduced by, the waltz, which is finally lost in an orchestral phrase, suggestive of Max's passionate complaints of the evil influence hanging over him. These complaints are embodied in a short recitative of but three phrases, joined by orchestral interludes with like expression. The last interlude quits its passionate expression and closes with gentler feelings. Thoughts of the peace and joy that used to be with him, whether in his hunting or in Agatha's welcome of him, find expression in a complete movement. This is in a concise but perfect sonata form, beginning in E flat:

with second thought in B flat, with second part, recapitulation of first thought and of main key, and with a full close.

The near approach of Zamiel, the evil spirit, though unseen by Max, recalls to his mind the gloomy thoughts; the music is no longer cantabile but in recitative, broken and fitful. Here comes into play what has since been called leit-motif, or leading tune. This is a phrase of music, or a particular device in instrumentation, or even a few notes only, equivalent to what in letters would be called an expression or a by-word, which is always introduced with the appearance or suggestion of a particular character or thought in the piece of music. In this case it is a tremolo for the violins, with a syncopated accent with other instruments, which is always used in this opera when the evil spirit appears or is thought of:

Ex. 161.

With the disappearance of Zamiel, thoughts of Agatha return, and the music is cantabile, in a simple, though complete form, with half-way cadence, full cadence, and codetta:

Ex. 162. Andante con moto.

A second time Zamiel appears, and renewed fears of evil influence come to Max, which this time are put into a quick movement, or cabaletta, of free rondo form. The principal subject of this is in C minor:

Allegro con fuoco.

Ex. 163.

the episode in E flat:

Ex. 164.

after which the principal key returns with new ideas in the same train of thought:

Ex. 165.

and the song is thus carried to the end.

The great scena for soprano in the same opera, containing the air, "Softly sighs," is a yet closer return to the Purcell form of the Italian cantata, as it has a greater number of alternations of recitative and rhythmic cantabile. Even in the final rondo, or cabaletta, the declamatory effect is brought in again for a moment after the episode and before the recapitulation of the principal subject.

MDME MENTER'S PIANOFORTE RECITAL.

The remarkable executive ability of Mdme Sophie Menter was shown last season in a light so striking that her reappearance at St James's Hall on Monday afternoon naturally—we had almost said necessarily—drew thither a large number of amateurs eager to renew acquaintance with a rarely gifted performer. Mdme Menter, as usual, addressed herself to an arduous programme, and played from memory no less than fourteen compositions, one of which—Schumann's "Carnaval"—is well-nigh a host in itself. Her rendering of some of these works, notably of that just named, may have called forth different opinions, and, as we believe, was not wholly beyond criticism. Mdme Menter kept her audience wondering, but wonder is not synonymous with admiration; nor, though astonished at the muscular power displayed, and at the facility which made ten fingers seem to be doing the work of twenty, could we approve a style of execution that apparently had no higher purpose. For the time Mdme Menter sank the artist in the executive machine. Not so in other parts of the programme. She played two movements by Scarlatti with delightful and appropriate simplicity. Two studies by Henselt also received justice, and afforded examples of real interpretive art; while in Liszt's very pleasing transcriptions of Schubert's "Morgenständchen" and "Wohin" Mdme Menter appeared at her best, giving, of course, unqualified satisfaction. The accomplished lady is one of the few who are in genuine sympathy with Chopin, and five selections from his works showed her preference for that master. Finally came Liszt's arrangement of the overture to Tannhäuser, which must have sent the audience away marvelling that the adapter ever expected anybody to play it; and, still more, that it was played in deed and in truth without the loss of a note. Mdme Menter gives a second recital on May 5, when Beethoven's "Sonata Appassionata" will be a leading feature.—D. T.

Scraps from America (Correspondence).—New Orleans subscribes 19,000 dollars for three months of French opera.—Etelka Gerster will be among the singers at the New York May Festival.—The thirteenth Sängerfest will be held in Philadelphia in June.—Theodor Thomas has decided to adopt the English Philharmonic pitch at the New York Musical Festival in May.—Mrs Osgood will prolong her stay in America for, at least, another twelve months.—Mdme Christine Nilsson has, it is said, signed a six months' engagement, beginning in September, for a tour.

MR GANZ'S ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.

A new season of these concerts began in St James's Hall on Saturday afternoon, under circumstances interesting enough to attract a very large audience. We need not examine the scheme of the new campaign—amateurs are more or less familiar with it—in order to prove that Mr Ganz is a skilful caterer for public taste. That fact has already been demonstrated, after a fashion beyond cavil, and was but confirmed by the programme of Saturday, wherein novelty and familiar excellence were combined, with a due regard for varied preference. The laudatores temporis acti had a good time with Beethoven's Symphony in B flat (No. 4), the overture to Egmont, Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, and a chorus for female voices from Glück's Iphigenia in Tauris. They had, in point of fact, the lion's share of the provision made, and were no more inclined to complain than the lordly brute who takes all he needs and leaves the rest to his humble and hungry courtiers. Whether the balance of the auditors grumbled or not is a distinct question; but one concerning which we need hardly trouble ourselves. The people who look upon Beethoven and Mendelssohn as among the vestiges of a pre-artistic world are, let us hope, a minority not to be taken into serious account. As regards the works just named, we have to deal only with their performance, which came fully up to the standard of previous seasons. The solo violin in Mendelssohn's Concerto was played by an artist, Herr Ondricek, who made his first appearance under Mr Ganz's bâton, and achieved a frank success. Herr Ondricek is a young man whose art should not be measured by his years. His tone, somewhat small in volume, is pure in quality; he uses the bow with singular freedom and power, and his rendering of cantabile passages shows true artistic feeling. In the last-named respect justice was done to Mendelssohn's tuneful and expressive themes, those of the slow movement especially gaining by the artist's delivery. The bravura passages, on the other hand, were somewhat marred by what seemed jerkiness, but was only exaggerated accent—a very good fault, leaning distinctly to the side of merit, and easily cured. Herr Ondricek will, no doubt, be heard from time to time during the rest of the season.

For the lovers of novelty at this concert, Mr Ganz provided a a work never before performed by an English orchestra. It bears the name of Franz Liszt, and represents that ambitious composer's view, in music, of Dante's Divina Commedia. As a matter of course, it covers all the ground, giving, in the first place, a tone-picture of hell; next, of purgatory; and, last, of heaven. One of these themes might have been thought sufficient for even an extraordinary man, but Liszt could hardly venture upon detaining an audience in the Inferno for the whole duration of a symphonic poem, and it was not to be expected that he would keep out of it altogether. Modern composers of a certain school love to work within a measurable and easily traversable distance of the nether regions, and the phenomenon deserves remark and study. We will not go so far as to say that they derive their inspiration thence; that they have a natural affinity with hot and sulphurous atmosphere, or that they are impelled by an instinct of consanguinity with the proper denizens of the abyss. It is more likely that, in a sensation-loving age, they find demons and blue fire pay. What would a Richardsonian drama be without its ghost? a country fair without the gentleman who consumes blazing tow? or a Christmas pantomime without a grotesque incarnation of devilry? Composers of the Liszt school ask a like question concerning their music and it must be said for them that they give it a practical answer. Hence the world of art has come to be filled, as far as they can fill it, with a mixed lot of fiends and spectres, variously engaged, but always in a congenial way. You cannot open a modern score now without a suspicion of brimstone, or listen to a modern orchestra without dread of shrieks and wailings accentuated by the triple bark of Cerberus. Liszt revels in the Inferno and seems at home there, while a good many of Saturday's audience appeared well content to bear him company. Every one to his taste, of course; but we venture to suggest that the rightful dwellers down below are entitled to complain of the way in which they are musically represented.

Song and story witness that the Inferno does not lack an ear for sweet sounds, with which, for example, Orpheus "half-redeemed his lost Eurydice." However, we may leave it to settle the matter with the composers concerned all in due time. Criticism of the first movement of Liszt's Symphony would be a waste of labour. Those who admire it do so with the fanaticism that transcends reason; and those who dislike it do so with an intensity that needs no deepening. Among the second class we have the honour to reckon ourselves. The "Purgatory" takes us into a quieter but still a complaining region, where short phrases for various instruments, often unaccompanied, answer each other in monotonous succession, with intervening pauses concerning which it was once said by an irreverent American critic that they were devoted to an examination of the thermometer. Finally we reach "Heaven," and listen to a "Magnificat" sung by female voices upon a Gregorian theme, with organ as well as orchestral accompaniment. Here, as indeed in each movement, occasional charming effects, heightened by contrast, are produced; but the impression left by the entire work is one of vast design and feeble accomplishment. Liszt is a composer of magnificent purposes. He should dream symphonies, not write them. With the pen in hand he resembles the king in the parable who began to build and had not wherewith to finish. All the same, let Mr Ganz be praised for affording another opportunity of discovering this fact, and for taking the great pains necessary to such a performance as was given.—D. T.

ST PETERSBURGH.—According to letters received from this capital, the German Theatre will henceforth cease to be a Government institution, and be carried on as a private speculation. The Italian Opera, on the other hand, is to be "Imperial." No important change has been made in the constitution of the French Theatre. Anton Rubinstein will be placed at the head of the Russian Opera-house.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF ARTS.

May-day will be celebrated this year in right good fashion at Burlington House, when at early morning the doors will be open to the public to enter and enjoy the art-blossomings of the season. As the may-pole has long ago been cut down and burnt, and the May-queen shorn by cynical civilization of her charms, the most becoming way now of spending the floral festival will be by visiting the Academy. On entering the first gallery the eye will be quickly caught by a picture (No. 64) by Munkacsy, in which a lady is seen arranging flowers for "la fête du papa," whilst her boy and girl are gleefully watching the progress of the task, and her littlest one, on the floor at her feet, is clutching with his tiny hands the loose and fallen petals. The subject is a simple one, and in the composition no labour is manifest. It does not seem a design, but rather the mere falling out of facts, seen for the moment, and then reproduced on canvas with marvellous realistic skill. Although the main subject is arrangement of flowers, there are no bright colours conspicuously placed, such as those used in nature by flowers to decoy the unsuspecting bee and other agents to labours of transmission. Munkacsy does not generally attract by bright hues; the present pic ure is dark in tone; the room, with its crowded furniture, is sombre; but upon the mass of shadow light falls, not in tricky flickers, but naturally upon the figures, and is reflected here and there from polished surfaces and glass of lamp and mirror. Close to the canvas the workmanship seems rough, but at the proper distance the strength of handling and loading of pigments work wonderful reality and life. Leighton's picture, "Wedded" (No. 71), will be found near the work of the famous Hungarian. A young woman leaning upon her husband's breast gazes into his eyes with rapture, tinged, however, with a shade of sadness — for do not doubt and fear follow mortals even in the fruition of their brightest hopes? The accomplished President is renowned as a draughtsman, and it will be taken for granted that the figures are perfect in symmetry of outline; the flesh tints partake not of the "red and white" of English beauty, but are darkened, as by an ardent sun, to resemble somewhat the monotony of dusky skin. The background is managed admirably with its cumulous clouds of tender glow overhanging water of deepest blue. Pettie's two pictures (Nos. 18 and 30) will command attention. The latter number is perhaps the more admirable. The Duke of Monmouth, bound by cords, is crawling on the ground to the feet of King James, and pleading abjectly for his forfeited life. The cold triumphant sneer of the relentless monarch contrasts well with the death pallor of the face lying at his feet, and the contrast is accentuated by the dark dress of the victor and the gay silks of the vanquished. Possibly some disappointment will be felt at Millais' "Dorothy Thorpe" (No. 43), but the author has treated the public to such magnificent displays of genius that ordinary skill fails to satisfy. On giving a last look in the room, a work by David Murray, "Glen Sannox" (No. 81), will force the visitor to pause and examine a powerful view taken in auld Scotland by one of those who love to study and depict the glories of their native land.

In the second gallery Cecil Lawson's "Blackdown" (No. 99) will attract the eye by force of colour dexterously applied. The unpretending sketch is drawn with strength and firmness. And, near here, Millais will be seen in force; his portrait of "Sir Henry Thompson" (No. 127) does full justice to the intellectual bearing of the renowned surgeon—a gentleman bound, in many ways, to art both musical and pictorial. "A Falling Barometer" (No. 128), by Brett, gives indications of dirty weather—the clouds tell it, the disturbed water shows it, the gull screams it, everything prophesies it but the vessel yonder, whose sails are as smooth and unbent as if the signs were all false. "A Pause in the Attack: Hougoumont, Waterloo" (No. 102), by Crofts, must not go unnoticed. The artist is wisely learning from his French brethren that episodes of great battles are the most interesting views of war. The English drummer, giving the wounded French soldier water to drink relieves, the horror spread around the scene. Such touches as these prove the poet as well as limner. Val Prinsep has done his best in "At the Golden Gate" (No. 163). No one will pass "Luncheon-time in a Venetian Sartoria" (No. 176), by Van Haanan, without making a halt, and the time will not be misspent. It is similar in character to former works exhibited. The girls, liberated from toil, are enjoying themselves with food and fun. One stands upon a chair to see how she looks in a fine dress she has been occupied upon; another is reading a letter that supplies merriment for a group lounging about the table, others are engaged in talking, whilst an elderly woman, the one in authority, looks upon the disorderly lot with surprise, annoyance and contempt. The picture is full of animation and humour. It is a source of satisfaction to know that in Mr Henry Woods, recently made an associate of the Academy, we have an Englishman equal in many respects to the foreigner just noticed. "Bargaining for an old master" (No. 182) is as full of colour, as replete with character, and perfect in detail, as Van Haanan's work. The detail is shown in the delineation of the multitudinous articles placed for sale by the old tradesman; the humour is shown in the two girls looking at the "old master" stretched out on the ground for inspection; and the quality of the colours, with their harmony, brilliancy, and disposition is asserted over the entire canvas. The youngest associate, in giving proof of the justice of his claims, has reflected honour on the entire body.

On some future occasion notices will be made upon Yeames's "Prince Arthur and Hubert" (No. 204), on Goodhall's "Memphis" (No. 212), on MacWhirter's "Ossian's Grave," Marks' "Lord Say" (No. 242), Herkomer's portrait of the Rev. W. H. Thompson (No. 251), on Pettie's "Palmer" (No. 251), Holt's wonderful portrait of "Captain Mitchell" (No. 260), Graham's "After Rain" (No. 274), Leslie's "Sally in our Alley" (No. 282), Long's Eastern subject (No. 302), Hook's "Caller Herrin'" (No. 303), Leighton's "Phryne") No. 307). The works of Dicksee, Broughton, McCulloch, Orchardson, Van Beers, A. Moore, White, Colin Hunter, Briton Riviere, John R. Reid, Elizabeth Butler, Fred Morgan, Waller, Pott, Henri Motte, Linton, Seymour Lucas, Stacey, Waterlow, Keeley Halswelle, Leader, Gow, D. W. Wynfield, Francesco Vinea, Collier, Wyllie, C. E. Johnson, Waite, and Joshua Mann—the works of all these excellent artists demand full and earnest consideration.

AMPHIGOURI.

If you wish to be the rage on the operatic stage,
You must murder ev'ry air;
When you want to sing with feeling, you must gaze upon the ceiling
With a look of deep despair.
Though the inartistic nation may implore consideration
Be bestowed on time and bar,
The Æstheticals will mutter, "You're a really quite too utter Operatic Evening Star."
Yes, ev'ry one will say,
As you trill your startling lay,
"If she can sing in this kind of style, that would be 'Burlesque' in me:
Why what a most unquestionable Queen of Song this Queen of Song must be!"

Would you give great satisfaction in the modern ballet action
That makes Covent Garden ring?
Pray be highly energetic in Quadrilles they call Æsthetic,
And gyrate with graceful swing.
Also dress in suit of sables, and go flying over tables
With a single agile bound;
Then skim a pretty fair way down a wide extensive stairway,
And retire whilst bowing round.
And ev'ry one will say
Of your light fantastic way:
"Though this is not precisely the style of dance we formerly used to see, Yet what a very elevated kind of Art this kind of Art must be!"

BAYREUTH.—The first two performances of Parsifal, on the 26th and 27th July, will be exclusively for members of the Patrons' Association. Then will come fourteen public performances on every following Sunday, Tuesday, and Friday, till the number is complete. Tickets, at thirty marks each, may be had from Herr Fr. Feustel, of this town.

VIENNA (Correspondence).—The following is, provisionally at least, the plan of campaign for the approaching season: Dvorak's Bauer als Schelm will be performed according to the Dresden version; Mdlle Bianca will appear as the heroine in Rheinthaler's Kätthchen von Heilbronn, and likewise take part in the revival of Bellini's Puritani. Leschetizky's Erste Falte is to be performed in conjunction with a new ballet, Die schöne Melusine. To the above works may perhaps be added Verdi's Boccanegra, Donizetti's Duca d'Alba, and Wagner's Tristan und Isolde, with Herr Winkelmann, from Hamburgh, and Mdme Materna in the leading parts. Before adopting any decision as regards Françoise de Rimini, the management intend awaiting the result of a few more performances in Paris. A performance of Meyerbeer's Robert le Diable was given for the benefit of the Pension Fund, and drew one of the best paying houses ever known.

SCHUBERT'S ALFONSO UND ESTRELLA.

(From a Correspondent in Vienna.)

Franz Schubert's three-act romantic opera, Alfonso und Estrella, has just been given at the Imperial Operahouse for the first time. "For the first time! The fact is hardly credible; we fancy we must be dreaming!" as says Herr Speidel of the Fremdenblatt, who then reminds us that the composer has been dead fifty-four years, and that the opera is nearly six years older. Schubert, too, was born in this capital and wrote the opera here. Liszt first produced it at Weimar in the first half of the fifties, and Hamburgh followed suit. "It has now," continues Herr Speidel, "become a possibility in Vienna, and we are glad such is the case, for a debt of honour to a local genius has thus been discharged. It was with more curiosity than interest that the general public went to the Opera yesterday evening" (the 13th inst.). "The lyrical treatment of the first act is a little spun out, but fresh life is breathed into it by the introduction of a fragment of the same composer's Rosamunde—a piece of the most charming of all ballet-music. In the second act—the most important one in all respects—the music, which is rich in beautiful fancy and by no means poor in dramatic conception, reaches a greater height. Those who do not hear the opera will be losers. It is admirably got up by Herr Fuchs, who has rendered essential service in arranging the present version of the text and music."

DANTE'S DIVINA COMMEDIA ACCORDING TO LISZT.

(From an old and valued Contributor.)

An event of interest took place on Saturday, when Mr. Wilhelm Ganz introduced the Abbé Liszt's musical parallel to Dante's Divina Commedia to a public comprising the eccentric composer's friends, and enemies, and neutrals. The friends, doubtless, knew the work by heart; the neutral listeners heard with a faint interest; the important auditors were the enemies, who appeared to have condemned the ambitious effort as no ambitious effort should be condemned—with a cheap satire as trite as it is profane.

Those who are not even ranked among the well-read are acquainted with the great Florentine's masterpiece, which he himself declared (in a letter to his patron, Cane della Scala) to have many meanings. They have doubtless felt the power which has led great painters to illustrate the graphic scenes so pathetically described, that power which has swayed the susceptible mind of Liszt till he has dared to probe the poem to its philosophical depths, and to cast the thoughts he has found there into Sound.

For, as scholar and thinker, Liszt has not attempted to relate the long story of Dante's vision of Hell, Purgatory, and Heaven. This would have been a comparatively easy task to any clever musician who cared to choose suitable subjects, and to treat them melodramatically. No unprejudiced hearer can fail to recognize that it is not the letter, but the spirit of the poem which is embodied in Liszt's music. It is not the damned souls, the Francescas and Paolos, the feminine monsters in Ancient History, the Helens and the Messalinas, brought together in the terrible darkness, that we hear wailing and deploring; it is the causes which wrought their despair, the emotions excited by the contemplation of these that are vividly suggested by Liszt, until the mind is impressed—till the hearer feels, learns, decides, is influenced—without the aid of image or embodiment.

Thus far, the aim of the composer is the very highest: to suggest and convey ideas that are outside language, to bring in music where words come to an end. The mere descriptions of Hell, Purgatory, and Heaven, Dante put into words. But the hidden meanings were to be inferred. The soul of the poem pervaded the lines as a human soul pervades its body. And this soul the most subtle of his many commentators have considered to be, not the lesser allegory of the political and religious struggle proceeding when he wrote, although lengthy allusions to these are parabolically made; not dogmatic disquisitions anent the life of the soul after its separation from the body, as some have supposed; but a vast picture of that subject which Dante loved as all other poets have loved it more or less—human life on earth.

Philosopher and poet, Dante had viewed the vexed question from all points, and the spirit of the Divina Commedia is undoubtedly his own conclusion as to the position in the universe of the human soul. That Liszt has grasped Dante's ideas and has struggled to convey them, many will believe after further hearings of the imaginative crudities of the Inferno. Dante would not be alone, were it certain that he recognized hell, heaven, and purgatory as mere states of the soul during its life on earth, for this is a favourite theme with many mystical writers, who recognize as hell the pampering of self and the frivolity of those who will not think why and wherefore they exist; who see in purgatory the wavering and fear of those rudely awakened from such a soul slumber; and in heaven that state where the soul sits clothed and in its right mind on the rock of faith, with the waves of passion beating harmlessly below its feet

Liszt's Inferno is a maze of sad tones of human passion and error, broken by the episode suggestive of mistaken affection, illustrated by the story of Francesca di Rimini. The sadness and hopelessness of wasted lives is almost oppressive, leading as it does to the more active state of cheerless questioning, the Purgatorio. Interrogation follows interrogation, restlessly, unsatisfied, till a point is reached where light breaks upon the scene, till the poor souls know the great reply, till they hold the key, and, however painful and difficult the action may be, thereby open the gate beyond which is Peace.

The Inferno is longest, Purgatorio being briefly treated, Paradiso being the great Amen. As purely metaphysical music, this pregnant composition, whatever may be its faults, cannot fail to take high rank. It remains for other composers, if they please, to be the exoteric musical interpreters of Dante—his esoteric representative in the world of music is found.

BYE-PAST TIME.*

ROMANCE.

The sky is blue, the sward is green,
The leaf upon the bough is seen,
The wind comes from the balmy west,
The little songster builds its nest,
The bee hums on from flower to flower,
Till twilight's dim and pensive hour;
The joyous year arrives: but when
Shall bye-past time come back again?

I think of childhood's glowing years—
How soft, how bright the scene appears;
How calm, how cloudless, pass'd away.
The long, long summer holiday!
I may not muse—I may not dream—
Too beautiful these visions seem
For earth and mortal men; but when
Shall bye-past time come back again?

I think of sunny eyes so soft,
Too deeply felt, enjoyed too oft,
When through the bloomy fields I rov'd
With her, the earliest, dearest lov'd;
Around whose form I yet survey
In thought a bright celestial ray
To present scenes denied; and when
Shall bye-past time come back again?

Alas! the world at distance seen
Appear'd all blissful and serene,
An Eden form'd to tempt the foot,
With crystal streams, and golden fruit;
The world, when tried and trod, is found
A rocky waste, a thorny ground;
We then revert to youth; but when
Shall bye-past time come back again?

WELLINGTON GUERNSEY.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

DEAR SIR,—I am requested by Herr Franke to inform you that, owing to a very severe domestic bereavement sustained by Herr Alfred Grünfeld, Herr Franke has agreed to cancel for the present the contract with him for the six Piano Recitals already announced to be given in the Marlborough Rooms in May next. Herr Franke has now, however, arranged to give a series of six Chamber Concerts on the corresponding dates, a prospectus of which I herewith beg to enclose. The first concert should prove to be one of special interest, as the programme will consist entirely of the works of English composers.

In connection with the Richter Concerts, Herr Franke has to announce that, as the orchestral parts of Brahms' new Pianoforte Concerto cannot be ready in time for the first concert, its performance is postponed to a later concert. Mr Eugene D'Albert will play, instead, Rubinstein's Concerto, No. 4, in D minor. He will also play, in due time, the Brahms Concerto, which he had the privilege of studying with the composer in Vienna.—I am, yours faithfully,

MARIE ROZE.

A correspondent informs us that Mdme Roze has just been engaged by Mr Carl Rosa as prima donna assoluta of his company for next autumn, winter, and spring, and will specially mount for her the operas, Lucrezia Borgia, Les Huguenots, and Fidelio. Mr Rosa, who intends Beethoven's masterpiece to be the special feature of his season, will invite the aid of the principal Choral Societies in the towns where it is played, so as to institute a grand festival performance similar to what Mr Mapleson has been doing with such success in America. Fidelio given under these conditions is certainly the best selection Mr Rosa could have made. "With Mdme Marie Roze as Leonora, Mr Ludwig as Pizarro, Mr Lyall as Jacquino, and Mr Barton McGuckin as Florestan," adds our informant, "the opera could hardly be better cast."*

Cherubini's first essay in Paris does not seem to have been particularly fortunate, and the Mercure de France, generally indulgent in its verdicts, especially towards foreigners and new comers, exhibits towards him a severity not usual with it. This is what it says:—

"At the concert on the 8th inst., we heard several airs by a new Italian composer, M. Cherubini. They were a symphony and three airs. The symphony must have confirmed the opinion of those who consider that this style of writing is not the style in which Italian composers distinguish themselves. The airs appeared to possess greater merit; the incoherence of the ideas and the small amount of character and interest in the motives, however, were indicative of the youth of the composer. The manner in which M. Babbini rendered the airs was worthy of the praise we have already bestowed on him, and which he would have deserved in a still higher degree had he chosen more distinguished music."*

If such was the impression made on the public, the composer's reception was not encouraging. Cherubini does not, appear, however, to have been affected by it, for, at Viotti's request, he promised he would return to Paris the following year and take up his residence with him. Then in the month of October, 1785, he started on his return to London, where he was bound to fulfil the remainder of his engagement. In the English capital, the first thing he did was to write six new pieces which were interpolated in one of Paisiello's most famous operas, Il Marchese di Tulipano; they comprised two tenor airs, an air for bass, a rondo, a duet, and "a supplement to the first finale." He wrote, also, two pieces for a work he does not name, and lastly he set about the opera he had to supply. It was in two acts and serious, its title being Giulio Sabino. It was presented to the public some time in the spring of 1786,† but, through the fault of the two artists entrusted with the principal parts, it obtained no more than an absolutely negative success. Dr Burney, in his History of Music, states this in very explicit fashion, declaring "this opera was strangled at its very birth," owing to Babbini, to whom was confided the "first man's" part, and Ferraresi, who sustained that of the "first woman," It was in this opera that Marchesi made his first appearance in London. This check, which was not attributable to the work itself, but to the unsatisfactory manner in which it was rendered, did not precipitate Cherubini's departure, for he remained in London till the end of July. It was at this time that he caused to be engraved and published there the collection of the six Nocturnes he composed at Florence in 1782. He prefixed to it a dedication to a noble Florentine, Corsi, Marquis of Caiazzo, Lord of Dugenta, Millazano, &c., and Chamberlain to the Grand-Duke and Grand-Duchess of Tuscany. The dedication was thus conceived:

"Should the trifling work, which I take the liberty of offering you, possess sufficient merit to meet with a favourable reception from your liberal mind, and, what is more, to obtain sincere approbation from your highly refined taste, I should have reason to flatter myself that it may be regarded not very unfavourably by the public, who are too well aware what an authority you are in matters concerning the fine arts, especially music, not to conform their judgment to yours. But in whatever way, noble Lord, you may be pleased to judge me, I shall, at least, have, thanks to my work, the satisfaction of expressing to you, as far as lies in my power, the sincere and thoroughly justified esteem which I entertain for the amiable qualities which endear you to all, at the same time that I shall be able, in the face of the world, to boast of being, with all the respect I profess, your devoted servant,

"L. CHERUBINI."‡

As we have seen, it was in the month of July, 1786, that

† In a catalogue containing only Cherubini's operas (for there are as many as three different catalogues of his works in his Memorandum Book) I find this entry in the paragraph concerning Giulio Sabino: "Performed for the benefit of M. Babbini."

‡ I beg to observe that, not having been able to find in France the collection of Cherubini's Nocturnes, I am obliged to re-produce the dedication from the English translation which, in his book on Cherubini, Mr Edward Bellasis has given of the Italian original. Mine is, therefore, a second translation in which the sense, at least, in some instances, if not the general tone, may have suffered some alteration. Cherubini left England and returned to France. He himself shall furnish some interesting and circumstantial details concerning his second stay in Paris:—

"On returning to Paris at the end of July, after the termination of his London engagement, Cherubini kept the promise he had made his friend, Viotti, with whom he now went to reside.§ The fact of his fixing his residence in Paris may, in some measure, be dated from this epoch. He was again presented to Queen Marie-Antoinette, who received him with as much kindness as ever, and admitted him to the private concerts she gave in the Château de Versailles, at the Princesse de Polignac's, where she sang, and where pieces of Cherubini's, rendered by the celebrated Garat, were among the compositions performed. At this period, too, Viotti urged him to undertake a French opera, and for this purpose made him acquainted with Marmontel, who entrusted him with the book of Démophon, which he began to set. It may here be mentioned that when Cherubini passed through Turin, in September, 1784, on his road to London, the noblemen who were the managers of the theatre in that town made him undertake to return and compose an opera for them in the winter of 1787. He set out, then, in the month of October, 1787, for Turin, with the object of composing the opera of Ifigenia in Aulide (three acts), which was played in February, 1788."‖

Between his return from London and his departure for Turin, Cherubini remained, therefore, in Paris from fourteen to fifteen months. It does not seem that during this rather long period, though generally such a hard worker, he did much. All I find entered in his catalogue for this space of about fifteen months is a cantata entitled Amphion, "composed for the concert of the Olympic Lodge," but not performed; and eighteen romances from Florian's Estelle, "composed and engraved at Paris, in two numbers." It has been said, and does not appear improbable, that, being about to compose a French opera, Cherubini wrote these romances with a view to familiarize himself with our language and prosody. However this may be, he was somewhat idle in Paris, leading a very easy life, and contenting himself doubtless with cultivating the acquaintances—as agreeable as numerous—to whom he was introduced by Viotti. The double existence of the two had, moreover, an artistic side, and a writer who constituted himself the biographer of both of them, describes it in these terms:—

"Viotti organized musical matinées for the sake of his pupils. Every Sunday, quartets and quintets were performed at them, and the master offered an audience of his own selection the treat of first hearing his concertos, to which the magic of his playing added so many beauties. To be admitted to these gatherings was esteemed a favour, and a very high one, though everything was done without any show in the rooms of an artist, or rather two artists—Viotti and Cherubini—who occupied them together. But genius rendered those rooms the sanctuary of the Muses. The two friends lived under the same roof for six years. Since then we have seen the virtuoso dedicate one of his concertos to the composer, and the composer delight in arranging for the piano a set of trios by his friend."¶

This agreeable and intelligent mode of life was not calculated to displease a young composer. But Cherubini had to leave when the moment came for him to go and fulfil the engagement into which he had entered with the managers of the Theatre Royal, Turin. He started from Paris—he has himself told us—in the month of October, 1787, and remained till March, 1788, in Turin, where he gave his Ifigenia in Aulide, which met with an enthusiastic reception. Here, for the first time, we possess tolerably circumstantial information of what took place, yet it has hitherto remained unknown, and no French biographer has made use of it. In the Calendrier Musical for 1789, the following letter, which gives an account of the performance of the Ifigenia, and seems to imply that the time spent by Cherubini in Paris had introduced into his style the beginning of the profound evolution which was to take place in him at his very first steps on the French stage:—

"Gentlemen,—At a moment when admirers of the lyric stage are regretting Gluck and Sacchini, it is consoling to announce another artist, who, though still very young, is even now producing the fruit of the ripest talent; this artist, already known by several successes in Italy, is M. Cherubini. He has just brought out at Turin an Ifigenia in Aulide, which owes its extraordinarily flattering reception principally to the composer's efforts thoroughly to ally the musical effect to the sense of the words, a plan almost unknown in Italy and interesting for our stage to which M. Cherubini intends devoting himself. 'The music of the new Ifigenia is,' so they write from Italy, 'in a style quite new for this country; now sublime, now tender, but invariably energetic and attractive, it produced almost unheard-of effects. The Court even could not resist the general enthusiasm; our princes, who do not usually applaud performances, applauded a great deal; such is the power of superior merit to extort imperiously tributes of praise, &c.' The public will perhaps learn with pleasure that the Italian composer will return very shortly to bring out Démophon, of which M. Marmontel has written the book. This first work will, it is said, soon be followed by a second, on a poem by another Academician as well known for his talent in music as in literature. It is much to be desired that our musicians would work with poets experienced in both arts; they would feel all the better the harmonious agreement which ought to reign between the poetry and the music, an agreement so necessary for French opera and one which would destroy the langour thrown over the action by the immutably periodical plan pursued by Italian composers. I have the honour to be, &c."

People were still, as we see, interested in the quarrel between the Gluckists and the Piccinnists, and in the reform of the French lyric drama, a reform which Méhul and Cherubini were soon about to transport from our first to our second lyric theatre, from the Opera to the Opéra-Comique. But things had not reached this point yet. We have just seen what a great success Cherubini achieved in Turin, a success which augured well for his approaching first dramatic essay in Paris and was calculated to console him for the unfavourable reception of his last opera in London.* It is evident that in his Ifigenia in Aulide he was already influenced by the ideas then prevalent in matters of art at Paris and that his residence among us had modified his manner of thinking and writing. He paid more attention than other Italians of that day to dramatic truth, he gave more substance to the expression of the words, and it is evident that an important evolution was commencing in his mind, which was especially inclined to analysis and reflection. The letter we read above contains a proof of this, and another piece of evidence, that of his pupil, Halévy, comes, half a century afterwards, to confirm it. This is what Halévy wrote about Ifigenia, the score of which he had before his eyes:

"This opera differs in style from Cherubini's preceding operas. It is already more nervous. We see springing up in it a certain freshness and virility, of which Italian musicians of his time were ignorant, or for which they did not care. It is the dawn of a new day; Cherubini was preparing for the struggle. Gluck had accustomed France to the sublime energy of his masterpieces; Mozart had just written in Germany Le Nozze di Figaro and Don Giovanni. It would not do to be left behind; it would not do to be beaten; in the lists he was about to enter, he would meet two giants. Like an athlete before descending into the arena, he anointed his limbs;

§ In 1786, Viotti lived at No. 20, Rue Notre-Dame-des Victoires. (See the Almanac de la Société olympique.) Subsequently, while Cherubini was still with him, he moved to No. 8, Rue de la Michodière. (See Spectacles de Paris for 1791.)

¶ Notice historique sur J.-B. Viotti, by Miel.

In an interesting work which Halévy began to publish on Cherubini, but which his many occupations would not allow him to finish, he has given concerning Cherubini's early visits to Paris facts which he could have had only from the author of Médée himself, and which are worth being repeated here: "Cherubini reached Paris at the beginning of 1788; he once more met Viotti, as devoted and faithful as ever. People's saloons were thrown open to him, and he was admitted to all the sweet delights of high Parisian life. Introduced at the house of Mdme d'Etiolles, at the Maréchale de Richelieu's, at the Abbé Morellet's, and at M. de Florian's, he was thoroughly successful. It was a happy time for him, because he felt greatly flattered at this success. He was then eight-and-twenty. A portrait, painted somewhere about this time by Mdlle Dumont, and preserved in his family, represents him as elegant, neat, endowed with a noble and expressive physiognomy, and a persuasive look. The world liked him, and he liked the world; he was for a moment the fashion, and became a 'lion.' He used to speak with pleasure of this period of his life, and retained an agreeable recollection of all the delicate marks of respect, and all the little attentions then paid him." (See Etudes sur la vie et les travaux de Cherubini, by F. Halévy, in the Moniteur des Arts for the 23rd and 30th March, and the 18th May, 1845.)

* We may here remark a somewhat singular coincidence. Pugnani, Viotti's revered master, who was then conductor at the Theatre Royal, Turin, and to whom Viotti must certainly have recommended his friend Cherubini, also brought out, in the course of the same season, a new opera at the King's Theatre. It was a Demofoonte, and Cherubini no doubt saw it performed just as he was on the point of returning to Paris and writing his own Démophon.

like a warrior about to engage in combat, he girded up his loins. We especially remark in this opera of Ifigenia in Aulide an admirable trio known to all lovers of music. From beginning to end it is filled with an expression, very deep and very true, of sadness and pity. Its form, too, is simple and grave. I cannot say why, but this trio has always struck me as symbolical. I am inclined to believe that, when writing it, Cherubini was under the influence of real sorrow. Perhaps, in this noble and sweet piece of inspiration, he was addressing a last farewell to his native country which he was about to leave, and leave, too, for ever, since, despite the desire and wish I have frequently heard him express, it was never his lot to see Italy again. Perhaps he felt remorse on the eve of adopting as his own another land. At the moment of consummating his voluntary exile, and of abandoning the country of his birth, perhaps a secret instinct, one of those inward voices which never deceive, warned him that the separation would be eternal; that he would not behold Florence, or the beloved family he left there, any more. A mournful reminiscence must have been awakened in his heart. It seems as though the beautiful trio, which it is impossible to hear without emotion, was the echo of this profound regret."‡

Cherubini crowned his Italian career with a brilliant success. But it could not modify the arrangements he had already made or induce him to renounce the project he had formed of settling in Paris. Henceforth he belongs to France, which he is destined never to leave again, except temporarily, and where he is also destined to end his days, after more than fifty years of uninterrupted labours.

CONCERTS.

Mr Ganz's Orchestral Concerts were resumed on Saturday afternoon last at the St James's Hall, and promise to be as interesting as those of 1881. Mr Ganz has provided a body of instrumentalists of the highest accomplishments, and hence the subscribers and casual visitors may again look for a series of orchestral performances of choice and finished excellence. Of this we had welcome foretaste in the playing upon the present occasion of Beethoven's massive overture to Egmont and his Symphony in B flat, the delivery in each case affording the usual unmingled pleasure. The event of the day, however, was the production, for the first time in this country, of Liszt's Symphony, which purports to illustrate the "Divina Commedia" of Dante, the three sections into which it is divided, respectively typifying the "Inferno," the "Purgatorio," and the "Paradiso." For details as to the plan of this extraordinary work, and the salient features of a vast amount of picture music as exceptional in design as turbulent and unruly in development, we may well refer the reader to Mr W. A. Barrett, whose able analysis circulated in the concert-room proved him to be a most timely "guide, philosopher, and friend." Aided by this informatory brochure, the dramatic affinity of the music to the separate narratives and incidental allusions of the poem were roughly conceded; but the effect as a whole, in spite of the critical amplifications and apostrophes of the annotator, was wild and bizarre, and astounded rather than delighted the audience. At the same time, the boldness of the composer in his conception of orchestral possibilities, and the audacious originality with which he reveals them, were facts well-known beforehand, thanks to the experiences of the master and his school afforded during the last few years by his advocate and disciple, Mr Walter Bache, and for further proofs of which, in the congenial scenes of the Commedia, no one was unprepared. Mr Ganz is entitled to thanks for this opportunity of hearing a work, remarkable unquestionably from many points of view, with which it was satisfactory to make a passing acquaintance, and at the same time to no stinted compliment for the admirable rendering that was secured by the carefulness of the preparation that had been bestowed upon it. The best skill of the instrumentalists and the keenest vigilance of the conductor were alike taxed, and in neither case were the necessities of the moment unmet. A new violinist of the name of Ondricek was introduced in the course of the concert. His performance of Mendelssohn's magnificent concerto proved him in a very few minutes to be an indisputable master of the instrument. The quality of his tone is thin but silvery, and in the latter respect is eminently agreeable to the ear; while his command over all the indispensabilities of executancy is undeniably ripe and complete. His reading of the concerto was singularly animated, betokening an earnestness of enjoyment which did not fail to communicate itself to the audience, who had every reason to be pleased with an artist destined, no doubt, to be an acquisition to the London concert-room. He achieved an unquestionable success. As the performance of the Dante symphony involved the presence of a large treble chorus for the singing of the Gregorian "Magnificat" in the "Paradiso" section, further use of the ladies was made in the second part of the concert, which they enriched with an imposing delivery of Gluck's well-known "Chorus of Priestesses," from the Iphigénie in Tauris, the grand and stately simplicity of which suggested no unpleasant contrast to the frenzied and bewildering eccentricities of Liszt.—H.

Schubert Society.—The second concert (seventieth since the formation of the Society) of the sixteenth season took place at Langham Hall, on Thursday evening, April 20, Schumann's compositions forming the first part of the programme. The Pianoforte Quartet, in E flat, opened the concert, played by Herren Hause (pianoforte), Ondricek (violin), Witt (viola), and Schuberth (violoncello). The other instrumental piece was the "Abendlied," transcribed for the violoncello, for which Herr Schuberth received a well-deserved encore. The vocal pieces were "Der Nussbaum" and "Widmung," sung by Miss Isabel Grant, and "Er der herlichste von Allen," by Mdme Vogri. The second part was miscellaneous, opening with Haydn's String Quartet, Op. 76, No. 3, played by Herren Ondricek and Hause (violins), Witt (viola), and Schuberth (violoncello). Miss Florence Bertini was encored after Liszt's Pianoforte Fantasia on Rigoletto, and Herr Ondricek, after a solo on the violin. Herr Hause played his new "Serenade," Miss Eugene Kemble repeated a new song, by F. Löhr, "It cannot be," and Mdme Vogri, Mozart's "Dove sono." Mdlle Lilas Spontini made her first appearance at these concerts, meeting with great success in Gounod's "Ave, Maria," and a new song, by Edward Holmes, "To thee, my love." Signor Villa gave Faure's "Les Rameaux" (violoncello obbligato, Herr Schuberth), and Miss Isabel Grant, Cowen's "Regret." The hall was very full, and the concert went off admirably.

Miss Rosa Kenney.—The matinée given by Miss Rosa Kenney at the Marlborough Rooms included recitals, songs, pianoforte pieces, and one comedy scene, admirably played—says the Whitehall Review—by Miss Kenney herself in conjunction with Mr Charles Wyndham. Tennyson's Charge of the Heavy Brigade, and the same poet's Passing of Arthur, were the two pieces chosen by Miss Kenney for the display of her powers in the elocutionary line, and she delivered both of them with admirable effect, bringing out the full meaning of the verses without indulging in the emphasis or the superabundant gesticulation by which so much recitation is entirely spoilt. There was no lack of fire in the first performance, nor of pathos in the second, and both were characterized and controlled by remarkable taste. But it was in the scene from The Hunchback, with herself as Helen and Mr Wyndham as Modus, that Miss Kenney was seen to the greatest advantage. Her acting was marked by qualities alike subtle and striking, by much humour, and by perfect grace and refinement. Miss Edith Wynne, Mrs Aylmer Gowing, Mr Herbert Standing, and Herr Krannick (pianist) took part in this highly varied entertainment.

Royal Albert Hall.—A concert, described as "English and operatic," was given in this hall on Saturday afternoon, under the direction of Mr William Carter, and largely attended. The English part of the programme consisted mainly of songs and concerted vocal pieces, which may be dismissed here with a brief notice of those most favourably received. Sullivan's "Orpheus with his lute" was among the fortunate ones, as sung by Miss Pattie Winter, a débutante, and pupil of Mr W. Carter. Miss Winter, who promises well, obtained a recall not only after this song but at the conclusion of Bishop's "Lo, here the gentle lark," which, however, did not suit her quite so well. Miss Anna Williams, in Dudley Buck's "When the heart is young," and Mdme Trebelli, in Mr Carter's "What the waves said," were thoroughly successful in pleasing the audience, helped, no doubt, by the popular character of the music. Mr Carter's song had to be repeated, and bids fair to become a general favourite. How "Let me like a soldier fall" was given by Mr Maas, "The King's Champion" by Signor Foli, and "The Message" by Mr Vernon Rigby can as easily be imagined as the measure of applause bestowed upon each of these esteemed vocalists. Mr Redfern Hollins had no less reason to be satisfied with his audience, obtaining, as he did, an encore for "The Bay of Biscay." The instrumental solos were played by Mr Carter (pianoforte) and Mr Edwin Bending (organ), who were heard respectively in the barcarolle from Sterndale Bennett's Fourth Concerto, and an Andante by the late Henry Smart. It had been announced as a special operatic feature of the concert that the Garden Act in Gounod's Faust would be played by Mdme Christine Nilsson, Mdme de Vaney, Mdme Trebelli, Mr Maas, and Signor Foli, the artists wearing the costume of the characters represented. It is hard to imagine how such an idea could have originated among persons having any notion of propriety and the ordinary fitness of things. But no doubt many were attracted by it, only to suffer disappointment. A handbill was distributed in the hall stating that Mdme Christine Nilsson felt unable to act in costume at her first public appearance since the death of her husband. This was unquestionably a relief to some; for the rest, the platform looked like a garden, with its array of beautiful plants, and, as the artists indulged in gesticulation and movement, little was left for imagination to supply. It is to be hoped that even this imperfect intrusion of the stage into the concert-room will not have the usual force of a precedent. Such a thing may be tolerated in America, when a prima donna is exploited with the sole object of making money; but here a better taste should prevail. The vocalists above named were, of course, perfectly familiar with their work, and quite capable of doing it well. We regret to add that as much cannot be said of Mr Carter's orchestra. To compensate in some measure for the disappointment which a portion of the audience may have felt, Mdme Nilsson sang "Angels ever bright and fair." This was the success of the day. Around the singer gathered the sympathies of every one present, and as she gave Handel's pathetic strain with most touching expression, it was felt that an irresistible appeal not only to admiration, but to kindly feeling, had gone forth. The audience responded with two hearty recalls.—D. T.

Musical Association.—The sixth monthly meeting of this society took place on the 3rd inst. at 27, Harley Street, when a paper was read by Mr Arthur O'Leary entitled "Sir Sterndale Bennett; a brief review of his life and works." The subject attracted many friends of the deceased composer. The lecturer touched upon the salient points of his career, and gave special importance to his visits abroad and his friendship with Mendelssohn and Schumann. In reference to these he read a letter from a connection of the Mendelssohn family, giving a graphic description of Bennett's social characteristics and his relations to Mendelssohn. Extracts from the criticisms of foreign writers were also given, proving the high esteem in which our countryman was held abroad. His friendly connection with Charles Kingsley and other notabilities was also alluded to. At the conclusion of the paper, the chairman, Mr G. A. Osborne, invited some of the members present to offer their remarks, and in response, Mr Kellow Pye referred to the friendship existing between him and the composer dating from the time they were fellow-students at the Royal Academy of Music. Mr J. T. Coleridge gave an interesting account of the origin of the "Ajax" music, and Mr Otto Goldschmidt spoke in terms of the highest admiration of our illustrious musician, both as a man and as an artist. He expressed his surprise at the temerity of any one daring to question Sterndale Bennett's claims to fame, and supported the suggestion that the publication of a handsome and uniform edition of his works would be a fitting tribute to his memory. After some complimentary remarks to the lecturer, the meeting separated.

The tenth and last of the St John's (Clapham) "Pleasant Evenings" was given at the rooms, Gaskell Street, on Monday, April 24th. An excellent programme of music was gone through, the singers being Mrs Sutton Sharpe, Misses Chatterton, Tyler, and Delia Harris (R.A.M.), Messrs Spencer Tyler and O. Borradaile. The instrumentalists were Mrs Sutton Sharpe (a distinguished amateur pupil of the veteran, W. H. Holmes), and Miss Mary Chatterton (a niece of the distinguished harpist of that name). Mrs Sharpe played a Scherzo by Brahms, Thalberg's arrangement of "Mi manca la voce," and a brilliant "Presto" by Mr W. H. Holmes; Miss Chatterton contributing her uncle's "Welsh Bardic Illustration." A feature of the evening was a clever "dramatic rendering," by Mr Percival Sharpe, of a scene from Old Love and the New. The concert terminated, appropriately, with the National Anthem.

Mr Oscar Beringer gave his fifth annual pianoforte recital at St James's Hall on Wednesday afternoon, April 26th, assisted by Mdlle Friedländer (vocalist) and Miss Randegger (pianoforte). Mr Beringer played Mozart's Fantasia in C minor; Brahms' Sonata in F minor, Op. 5; Chopin's Ballade in A flat, Op. 47; Carl Tausig's Ungarische Zigeunerweisen (first time in London); as well as, with Miss Randegger, Franz Liszt's Concerto Pathétique (for two pianofortes), and Rubinstein's Serenade, Op. 16, No. 3; together with Franz Liszt's Consolatione (Nos. 3 and 5), and Polonaise in E. Mdlle Friedländer sang Lieder by Schubert, Rubinstein, and Lassen. Mr Eugene Dubrucq accompanied.

Miss Navarre, a rising young artist, gave her first matinée musicale at the Marlborough Rooms, on Thursday last. Miss Navarre was assisted by Misses Damian, Belval, and Emma Barnett, Messrs. Rea, Elliott Langworth, De Lara, Thorndike, L'Estrange, and George Grossmith. The concert gave satisfaction to a fashionable and numerous audience.

New Southgate, N.—A very successful concert was given on Wednesday evening, April 19th, Miss Clara Dowle (student at the Guildhall School of Music) contributed "The Watchman and the Child" (Cowen) and "Let me dream again" (Sullivan), being called upon to repeat both. Miss Annie Boulton gave "Auntie" (Behrend) and "The Miller and the Maid" (Marzials). Mr W. G. Forington, Tito Mattei's "Oh! hear the wild wind blow" and F. Clay's "Gipsy John" (both encored). Mrs Waud, Misses Waud, C. Willows, and Gardiner; Messrs W. O. Waud, J. Banister Brown, and Walter Homewood also assisted.

PROVINCIAL.

Rochester.—The last of the three grand Subscription Concerts of the Rochester, Strood, and Chatham Choral Society was given in the new Corn Exchange, on Monday evening, April 24th, before a numerous and fashionable audience. The first part of the concert consisted of Mozart's Requiem, and the second of a selection from Handel's Samson, the exponents being Misses Mary Davies and Damian; Messrs William Shakespeare and R. Hilton. The band (composed of members of Mr Manns' Crystal Palace Band) and chorus numbered about 200. Mr Jacques Rosenthal was the leader of the orchestra, and the conductor was the Rev. W. H. Nutter. It is scarcely necessary to inform our readers that, with such excellent vocal and instrumental "materials," the performance of Mozart's Mass was beyond reproach, and that it was listened to with the deepest attention. The selection from Samson consisted of the overture; the choruses, "Awake the trumpet's lofty sound," and "Then round about the starry throne," "To song and dance we give the day," "Fixed in his everlasting seat," and "Let their celestial concerts all unite." The airs given were "Return, O God of Hosts" (Miss Damian), "Let the bright seraphim" (Miss Mary Davies), the trumpet obbligato part to which was remarkably well played on the cornet by Mr L. W. Hardy, "Total eclipse" (Mr Shakespeare), and "Honour and arms," (Mr Hilton), together with the duet, "Go, baffled coward, go," energetically declaimed by Messrs Shakespeare and Hilton. Between the first and second parts of the concert, at the request of the committee, Mr Jacques Rosenthal, the accomplished violinist, played a movement from John Sebastian Bach's suite in D, and played it in a manner so thoroughly artistic that he won golden opinions from the audience, who duly acknowledged the pleasure they had received from his performance by awarding him hearty and unanimous applause. The thanks of the subscribers are due to the committee for organizing such excellent concerts, to the Rev. Mr Nutter for his able conducting, and to the honorary secretary, Mr Geo. Watson, jun., for the perfect way in which he organized and carried out the intentions of the committee.

Wigan.—On Tuesday last the Wigan Amateur Orchestral Society (under the patronage of the Countess of Crawford and Balcarres, and Col. McCorquodale, High Sheriff of Lancashire) gave a grand promenade concert in the public hall, the conductor being Mr Peter Taylor. The house was crowded in every part, and the performance was very successful. The singers were Miss Jones, Dr L. V. Mapei, and Mr W. A. McClure.

Sir Michael Costa.—Strong hopes are entertained that this great and long-popular conductor will once more be at his post during the Handel Festival, which he has marshalled and directed ever since the preliminary-trial meeting, in 1857.

Miss Elizabeth Philp, the popular song writer, announces an evening concert at St. James's Hall on Friday, May 19th. Several new compositions from her pen are to be introduced by Mdmes Sterling and Fassett, Messrs Maybrick, Marzials, &c. Special mention is made of a "humorous part song," composed expressly for the London Vocal Union, the words of which are by Mr E. L. Blanchard. The many friends and appreciators of the clever and amiable lady will unite in wishing her all possible success.

Royal Academy of Music.—The Llewelyn Thomas Gold Medal was competed for on Thursday last week, the 20th April. The examiners were Messrs Deacon, Handel Gear, and John Hullah (chairman). There were sixteen candidates, and the medal was awarded to Kate Hardy. The Evill Prize (a purse of ten guineas) was also competed for, with the same examiners. There were six candidates, and the prize was awarded to John G. Robertson. The Santley Prize (a purse of ten guineas) was also competed for, with the same examiners. There were thirteen candidates, the prize being awarded to Beatrice Davenport.

ROYAL ACADEMY ORCHESTRAL CONCERT.

(From the "Era," April 9, 1882.)

There is so much excitement in the musical world just now respecting the Royal College of Music that some are apt to forget that we have a College of Music already in existence which has done and is doing great service. Whatever may be done on behalf of music in the future, it would be the height of injustice to the Royal Academy of Music to ignore its honourable record. Some of our best and ablest musicians, our most successful vocalists, and cleverest orchestral and solo players owe their training to the Royal Academy; and, while such good work is done as we find is accomplished at present, there is not the slightest reason why the institution should fade out of existence because of the establishment of a Royal College of Music. Nor do we feel that there is any fear of such a result. The training at the Royal Academy is excellent, and the exertions of the esteemed principal, Professor Macfarren, have had a most beneficial influence on the fortunes of the establishment. The orchestral concert of the students, which took place on Saturday evening last, at St James's Hall, was a most brilliant and successful display of the talents of the pupils, and was also important as affording abundant proof of the care bestowed by the professors in the cultivation of their pupils. We know there are some who carp at the Academy because greater things are not done in composition, but this is not only unjust, but ignorant, criticism. The genius to write original music is bestowed upon a few. Out of all the thousands of musicians Germany has produced, we can count upon our fingers the really great names. Besides, it will be time enough to complain of the scarcity of English composers when there is a greater demand for English music. There has been too great a rage for merely foreign names. Even a composer of real genius like Sir Sterndale Bennett is too often neglected, although composers like Mendelssohn and Schumann appreciated him as one of the first of modern musicians; and, in fact, he is really a classic composer in a far more legitimate sense than many of the Teutonic geniuses, who gleam like will-o'-the-wisps only to deceive the unwary. Setting aside, therefore, all visionary ideas, let us praise without reserve what is being done by the Royal Academy of Music. The concert of Saturday night was worthy of the institution, and even in the matter of composition there were examples of great promise. The overture in F minor, by F. K. Hattersley (Balfe scholar), was a melodious, skilful, and interesting work, reflecting much credit on the young composer. It was well scored, and the ideas were novel and fresh, if not showing great individuality. But Beethoven himself did not display much originality, when he was at the age of Mr Hattersley, whose work was received with such favour that the audience would not be pacified until the youthful composer appeared on the platform. Professor Macfarren had issued a very sensible notice against encores and re-calls, but the verdict was so emphatic in this instance that the Principal consented to relax the rule, and Mr Hattersley was warmly applauded. Mr H. Smith is also another promising student in composition, while the vocalists and solo players in many instances possess such ability as to warrant us in predicting a bright future for them. Miss Charlotte Thudicum, in Mozart's "Non mi dir," and in the soprano music of Haydn's Third Mass, greatly pleased the audience. The bright, fresh, pure, and telling quality of her voice and her good intonation fully justified the hearty applause bestowed. Miss Beare in "With verdure clad" also distinguished herself greatly; Miss Josephine Pulham and Miss Arnold, with Miss Hilda Wilson, equally deserving honourable mention. The pianoforte playing was excellent. Mr Samuel Wiggins, in the first movement of Beethoven's Concerto in E flat, played with the finish and refinement of an experienced performer; and Miss Marian Davis, in the graceful and masterly Caprice of Sir Sterndale Bennett, acquitted herself admirably. Miss F. Smith was also successful, and Mr W. C. Hann played a violoncello solo in good style. Other students appeared, and showed talent and careful study. Mr W. Shakespeare conducted the orchestra with the utmost zeal and musicianly care. The concert was, in fact, in all respects highly creditable to the Royal Academy.

BERLIN.—Brogi, the barytone, very popular here, chose Ernani for his first appearance at the Central Skating Rink. The house was full.—The premises at present occupied by Stern's Conservatory having long since been found too small, a new edifice is being erected in the garden of what was the Chinese Embassy.—The monument in memory of the late Professor Heinrich Kotzolt, assistant conductor of the Royal Cathedral choir, was unveiled on the 17th inst. A tall granite plinth bears a striking likeness in marble bas-relief of the deceased. Underneath is the inscription:—"Heinrich Kotzolt; born, August 26th, 1816; died, July 2nd, 1881." At the back are the words:—"Erected by his Friends and Pupils."

DANTE-LISZT.

The first of a new series of these excellent concerts took place at St James's Hall on Saturday afternoon, when Liszt's symphony in illustration of Dante's Divina Commedia was performed for the first time in England. It was Mr Walter Bache who, at his annual concerts, first brought prominently and persistently before the English public those works of exaggerated effort and mistaken ambition by which Liszt has striven for many years to be recognized as a great composer, not having been content with the position which he long ago gained—without dispute—as a pianist of rare powers and accomplishments. Most, if not all, of his twelve Symphonische-Dichtungen (besides other elaborate works) have now been given (some more than once) in this country, and it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that more than due attention has been called to productions in which arrogant (even insolent) self-assertion, unbridled eccentricity, confused and incoherent thought, usurp the place of all that, according to the classic models of the past, constitutes what is properly called musical composition. The estimation in which Liszt holds his own capabilities is indicated by the names of the authors whose grand conceptions he has dared to couple with his laboured and vapid musical illustrations. Besides the great Italian poet named above, Shakspere, Tasso, Goethe, and others have been dragged into association with sounds that to cultured musicians are subversive of all poetical imaginings. As an imitator of Berlioz in the use of superabundant orchestral effects Liszt gives factitious importance to thoughts that are seldom of any intrinsic value, and are often little better than alternate patches of frenzied rant and maudlin affectation; more like blobs of colour of different shades thrown promiscuously on a palette than an orderly and thoughful arrangement thereof on canvass by the hand and mind of an artist. To go into minute details as to the Dante symphony would be a travestie on criticism—the work itself having more the effect of a burlesque than of serious musical thought. The first division, "Inferno," is more suggestive of its subject than either of the two following movements, as it mainly consists of a series of groans and yells from the more demonstrative brass instruments, screams from the piccolo, passages of diminished sevenths, chromatic scales, &c., with no organized arrangement, and extremely painful to listen to. Perhaps all this may be considered by some authorities as being true to the subject. If so, it is such naked and ugly truth as had better have been left undisplayed. Had the humourist who said that perhaps music is the "least disagreeable of noises" been able to hear Liszt's illustration of the "Inferno," this answer to a question as to whether or no the respondent liked music would doubtless have been worded differently as to the adverb. The few intermittent quiet strains, Andante amoroso, have no musical value, and only serve to make the surroundings more hideous. The least offensive portions of the symphony are the illustrations of "Purgatory and Paradise. In the former are some not disagreeable, but rather commonplace, melodic phrases, reiterated ad nauseam; and the last movement derives its chief impressiveness from the introduction of a Magnificat, sung, by a choir of female voices, to a simple Gregorian chant; the orchestral details, including the use of harps, being fanciful and skilfully varied. Throughout the whole work there is nothing to compensate the attention which it claims for something like an hour's duration; and such productions can only be admired by those who are ignorant of, or who are disposed to cast aside, what is great and good in the music of the past. If such things are to be estimated as products of high thought and finished art, then we may expect to be called on to accept corrosive sublimate as wholesome food, and aquafortis as refreshing drink. Mr Ganz deserves praise for his enterprise in bringing the symphony forward as it has afforded an additional opportunity for judgment as to the claims of Liszt to be estimated as a great composer. The work had been carefully prepared, and the elaborate and difficult orchestral details were finely rendered by an excellent band (headed by Mr Pollitzer as principal violin), and the choral portions were well sung by an efficient choir, Mr Ganz conducting the performance with care and skill.—*D. MAD. MENTER'S RECITAL.

SIR,—I was present at the first recital of Mad. Sophie Menter, last Monday, in St James's Hall. My impression on leaving was that I had been listening to some extraordinary pianoforte playing, but that I had never once breathed a sigh, or dropped a tear. Will you explain? Yours respectfully, THOMAS NOON GADD.

[Certainly not. The programme was a harlequinade in two parts, the first part embracing (why "embracing"?) Schumann's Carnaval, the second consisting of a motley array of pieces by sundry composers, with one or two of whom Abbé Liszt somehow got inextricably mixed up.—Dr Blidge.]

SHAKSPERE'S BENEFITS TO THE STAGE.

With all the admiration for Shakspere that from time to time breaks forth in enthusiastic eulogies, we do not believe that the obligations that the stage is under to the very monarch of dramatists have been fully realized. We are not going back to the well-trodden ground of the state of the English Drama before Shakspere wrote for the stage, to dilate upon the wonderful revolution made by him in his too short life. This has been done over and over again, and the fact must strike anyone who reads a play antecedent to or contemporaneous with our great poet. We have ourselves compared, or rather contrasted, Shylock with Kit Marlowe's Jew of Malta, and the distinction that we then drew may fairly illustrate the vast difference between even so able a dramatic writer as Marlowe and the inspired genius of Stratford-on-Avon. Such comparisons, however, are, as we have said, not only to a great extent needless, and, perhaps, unprofitable, but they have the fault of having been made too often. Shakspere's benefits to dramatic literature were the outcome of his genius as a writer, and had he been led to another form of authorship, it is probable that he would have induced a great advance also in that branch of letters, although it is hardly likely that the progress would have been so marked as was that manifested in his dealings with plays and their belongings. It is to be remembered that literature had very little of a popular character in his time—at least literature of a worthy kind; and it is not to be supposed that the "understanding gentlemen" quite deserved their epithet as regarded their complete appreciation of the great dramatist who had to submit his mind's treasures to the limited judgment of his contemporaries. One benefit that he conferred upon his own time he has to a great extent bestowed upon after generations, even upon our own. We refer to the dramatic rendering of the history of England; and, whilst we regret that the chronicles that supplied him with his subjects were not in themselves more accurate, we must yield him unstinted admiration for the graphic and generally dramatic form into which he has shaped the incidents that were and should ever be of interest to Englishmen. It was a great thing for the stage that Shakspere made it the most vital narrator of the history of our country that was or is possible for us to have. From his writing of the first part of Henry the Sixth, when he was twenty-five years old, to the last of his Anglo-historical plays, Henry the Eighth, produced in 1603, when he was aged thirty-nine, he never lost sight of the triple duties of his task, namely, to entertain, to instruct, and to inculcate in his hearers the noblest lessons of patriotism and national courage. "King and Country" was the password that he never swerved from; he might be biassed by the opinions and prejudices of his time; he was, of course, misled occasionally by the chronicles that were his guides; but he made the actors the noblest, the best teachers of English history that the people could have, and we assert our belief that vast numbers of our countrymen at this present time have a more vital conception of our history of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries from Shakspere and the actors than they have obtained from books or lectures. This alone constitutes a vast benefit conferred by the dramatist on the Stage in identifying it with the honour and glory, the courage and wisdom of our land. It is also a vast honour for the Stage to possess the grandest and most sublime secular literature that the world holds; literature so rich, so wise, and so complete that there is no branch of learning that can dispense with it, and no bigot (whose great delight is to attack the Theatre) who dare deny the mighty inspirations of its bard. It is to Shakspere's genius that the English Stage has owed the position that it has held in the eyes of the educated world. It has been his thoughts, the creations of his mind, the harmonies of his nature that have made the whole world, that speaks his language, kin. It is not for us at the present time to consider how far Shakspere has conduced to the formation of the German drama, although the greatest æsthetic students and authors of Germany have displayed an appreciation of his magnificent abilities, second only to the most cultured of his own countrymen. Augustus Schlegel found time too short and words too weak to express his estimation of Shakspere's endowments. Goethe has given, in his Wilhelm Meister, an analysis of Hamlet's character hardly second to any English commentary; indeed, German literature of a date when its drama had but few worthy representatives, teems with admiration of the one author who has crowned our Stage with honour in the past, given it lustre in the present, and conferred upon it immortality in the future.

But, apart from such honours as Shakspere may have brought upon himself, and, by association, upon his calling, we would instance the practical benefit that his descendants have derived from his writings. A clever essayist years ago wrote a jocular paper upon "Shakspere as a man of small parts," and the jest was permissible enough, only the adjective was hardly well chosen in its direct sense. The poet had written many short parts; but, generally speaking, there is more in them than we shall find in those of equal length of any other dramatist. There is a well-founded complaint that there is no school for acting in this country at the present time: it is said that touring companies are destroying the chances that young people used to have of learning their profession. It is an assertion too patent to all for any one to dispute, and, in such a trouble, thoughts of Shakspere remind us once more of the obligations for which the Stage is his debtor. It will be as Balthazar that the tyro shall take his early teachings of Romeo, and it is as Bernardo or Marcellus that some future Hamlet may learn of him he looks upon, and, if his schooling live in his memory, he shall be thankful amongst others for this service of the dramatist; grateful alike for the short parts that gave him practice and opportunity, as well as for those mighty ones that came at first by looking on the impersonation of others before he dare render them himself. At all times were these short parts a boon to dramatic acolytes, at no period in the history of the Stage were they more valuable than now. Your small mind may find such characters unprofitable, barren, and dry; but he whose inspiration is growing will see that the lesser leaves and the greater spring from the same tree, have the like verdure; and those who think the former dry and withered have first withdrawn them from their parent stem and with their own neglect have allowed the life sap of their nature to waste away. Shakspere has conferred no greater benefit to the Stage than these short parts, despised by many who would cease to do so if they studied them.

But one more benefit does our Stage especially owe to its mighty creator, and perhaps this influence is more valuable, more enduring in its weight, more powerful than any author of any time has had upon the literature of his country since the pen had the task of tracing the creations of the mind. To Shakspere has fallen the work of checking from time to time the degeneracy which fashion and circumstance contributed to bring upon the theatrical performances of many epochs of the Drama since the mighty poet lived. The profligacy of a dramatic literature written for the debauchees of Charles the Second's vicious Court, the impertinent meddlings of Colley Cibber, and of men who had not his capabilities to excuse them in their insolence, the uncongenial importations of the French Stage, the maudlin sentiment that had occasionally made itself heard upon our boards, in George Coleman the Younger's plays amongst others, all have been in their turn brushed away to make room for the unalloyed gold of Shakspere, whose sterling value at once showed the meretriciousness of that which had for a time supplanted it. It is, probably, this standard of worth and excellence that is fated to maintain the English drama for ever from a decline that no other country is so well guarded from. Racine, and Corneille, and Voltaire have a stiltedness that stands in their way when their works would appeal to the enthusiasm of their countrymen; not so Shakspere. He has from the very truth of Nature drawn the instincts of the characters with which he dealt; and has set an example to all that shall come after him the one salient axiom that all the characters of a play are the men and women of this world, not the impossible heroes and villains of a madman's imaginations, or a pedant's artificial invention. This truth to Nature was the test-point of his plays; and it is in their relation to life, as it was and is, that he has distanced all competitors; and now, as we believe he ever will do, he acts as a landmark in literature to bring men back from devious paths and dangerous roads, ever teaching us the lesson he had learnt by heart, and by which he made the whole world kin.

"Messrs Boosey & Co. have done good service not only to amateurs but to art, by including in their series of volumes of national melodies 'The Songs of Scandinavia' and 'The Songs of Eastern Europe.' The first-named contains eighty-three examples; and the second, a hundred. We need not insist upon the importance of collections like these, whatever the country they represent; but we must say that no musical library is complete without the songs of Scandinavia and Eastern Europe. The editor, Mr J. A. Kappey, has taken great pains to secure melodies of a genuinely representative character, and at a time when attention is becoming more and more directed to folk-tunes as a source of new thematic ideas, the volumes in question are of peculiar value. They have our most hearty commendation, the 'Songs of Eastern Europe' more especially, since the volume contains, besides examples of Liszt, Chopin, and other masters, a very valuable collection of volkslieder from the hitherto untouched wealth of the Austrian provinces."—Daily Telegraph.

"Messrs Boosey & Co. have published two additional volumes of their National Songs, which appear likely to be the most interesting of the series. We know little of the rich repertory of Scandinavian Songs, and Mr and Miss Kappey, the editors of these books, are to be thanked for introducing some of the best specimens to public notice. Five of the Russian songs are so old as to be traditional; and in the series are to be found a beautiful Cossack lullaby by one Bachmetieff, a gipsy song by Lvoff, and several songs by Warlamoff. These and the Polish songs (all of which are traditional) may be considered among the most interesting items of a small but acceptable collection. Two ancient Lithuanian songs, a couple of Finnish, and four ancient Norwegian melodies, will likewise be found in the book. The majority of the Swedish songs are by Lindblad, that prolific song writer, who died in 1864. Tradition says that the old melody of 'The Beggar Boy' was once sung in the days when she was a poor child by the distinguished artist now known as Mdme Christine Nilsson. Included in the Danish songs is the traditional 'Dannebrog,' the music of which is attributed to one 'Bay.' It would be interesting to inquire the foundation for this statement, as the origin of the Danish National Anthem was generally understood to be unknown. The tradition of the 'Dannebrog Banner,' which, in 1719, fell down from heaven to bring victory to the Danish arms, is duly recorded in a footnote. Most of the Dutch songs given date back to the sixteenth century; and there are besides three songs by W. F. G. Nicolai, and one Flemish song. Altogether eighty-three of the national songs of northern Europe are included in this valuable and interesting book. In future editions a larger preface or more footnotes, giving further particulars of the old songs whose history is known, would be welcome. Equally interesting are the songs of Eastern Europe, recently issued by Messrs Boosey, and likewise edited by Mr and Miss Kappey. Among the thirty-four Austrian songs, the large majority are volkslieder, and they include Tyrolean, Styrian, and Polish songs, two of them by Chopin. These are followed by twenty-three characteristic specimens of Hungarian songs, giving a very fair idea of the peculiarities of Hungarian music, and comprising modern songs by Liszt, and some traditional songs of Bosnia, Moravia, and Dalmatia. The first of the Bohemian songs is the 'War-song of the Hussites,' once, it is believed, the national song of the country. A few specimens of Servian, Swiss, Greek, and even Turkish melodies. The last are very peculiar; and he peculiar intervals common to this and other Eastern music are claimed by some to have been handed down direct from the music of the ancient Hebrews."—Figaro.

THE NIBELUNG'S RING.

(From the "Daily Telegraph.")

Having, in a former article, touched upon some of the novel principles illustrated by Wagner's great drama, there now remains to notice the most important of them all—namely, the manner in which music is applied to it. Let no reader unacquainted with the poet-composer's ultimate method — if there can be an ultimate method while such a restless and changeful mind exists and works —let no reader, we say, imagine that in speaking of music, as "applied" to the drama, we use terms carelessly. The typical Italian opera hardly lives apart from its music. With a view to music, its scenes, incidents, and dialogue are arranged; and we should not be far wrong were we to assert that in this case the poet is the humble servant of the composer. Wagner's method in the Nibelung's Ring is precisely the reverse. It may not be true that he wrote his drama without reference to music at all, because he distinctly speaks of a text which "yearns" for musical expression. Nevertheless, it is a fact that the Nibelung's Ring could be represented without the help of the sister art, and so given would not be found lacking in interest. It stands alone, a complete creation, self-contained; music coming to it only as so much plastic material, usable at will for the strengthening of emotional expression, and for another and unique purpose, presently to be dwelt upon. The distinction here pointed out is very important. It is the key to the situation, and should never be lost sight of by those who would judge Wagner, not on principles he disowns, but on those which really form the basis of his action.

Till the development of the Wagnerian method, composers wrote dramatic music substantially on the same lines; such change as was made from generation to generation tending to the more intimate alliance of the poetic sentiment and musical expression. Music is the natural language of the emotions, which find through it fuller, deeper, and more subtle utterance than is possible to words. But ever since it began to have a grammar and rules; ever since the art was invested with some of the qualities of a scientific study, it has had to reckon with a tendency towards another and less legitimate use. There have been times when music, instead of making an appeal to feeling, challenged the admiration due to a mathematical exercise. At other times we have seen it employed in conjunction with words, but with no thought of fitness or of anything higher than the display of executive ability. These departures from the natural function of the Art have worked serious mischief by delaying its true progress; but they have not prevented a continuous, if somewhat irregular, advance towards emotionalism in general; and, as regards lyric drama, towards a closer alliance between the sentiment of the words and that of the music. The classic masters, however, applied their art to drama on very simple principles, which may be found perfectly illustrated in Beethoven's Fidelio. We do not overlook the fact that Weber extended its use when he identified certain themes or harmonic combinations with particular characters, introducing Zamiel, for example, by means of a "diminished" chord, coloured by the low notes of the wind instruments. Still, generally speaking, the aim of the masters was to seize upon the predominant feeling of the situation, and give it adequate expression without reference to the personages and motives involved. The magnificent dungeon scene of Fidelio is a case in point. Here there is no attempt at individual characterization, and no effort to picture the various dramatic incidents. A composer of the present day would, most likely, do both and distract attention, as well as dispel the broad effect of the scene by a multitude of details. Beethoven knew better, or, as some would have it put, did not know so much. His music works upon us without removing our regard from the stage. We are conscious of its gloom, its terror, and its despair; its fierce passion, tenderness, and rejoicing, yet not so actively conscious as that we are drawn out of the situation. In this respect we resemble a man who, looking on some fair, broad landscape, feels the beauty of a whole made up by a multitude of unregarded parts. If it be the province of music to express emotion, this is the only artistic method in which it can be used to that end. To fritter away attention on a crowd of minutiæ, demanding for their recognition a distinct exercise of the mind, is to imitate the painter, who, in transferring a hedge-row to canvas, bestows as much care upon each wild flower as though the observer had a separate eye for every bloom. The tendency of modern work is in the direction of such minute "tone-painting." Instead of making an appeal to our feelings, in consonance with the appeal of the drama, composers, nowadays, call upon our mental perception and keep us busily employed in recognizing this, that, and the other supposed musical equivalent for person, incident, and motive. Substantially, we have to occupy our faculties with two representations: one of dialogue and action, and another in which music, moving on parallel lines with its companions, as far as possible imitates it. It has, however, been reserved for Wagner to give this idea a new and elaborate development. With him musical characterization becomes a fundamental principle, to which that of emotional expression is subordinate, and the orchestra—the voices for the most part declaim —acts like a gigantic indicator, continually working its many arms as guides to the personages and purposes of the play.

It must be clearly understood that in the foregoing respect, the method of the Nibelung's Ring is that of the Flying Dutchman and a great deal more. The "representative themes" of Wagner's early operas are few in number, of considerable development, easily recognized and remembered; whereas in the Nibelung's Ring they are many, often consisting of a few notes, and make heavy demands both upon perception and memory. Nor is this all. Their scope is enlarged, and their use so complicated that even Wagner's most thoroughgoing disciples seem to look upon the music of the Nibelung's Ring as a maze; one of them, Hans von Wolzogen having kindly published a guide, which his brother, Ernst, has translated into a language that, at a pinch, will pass for English. By studying this little book amateurs can obtain a clear idea of the amazing system which Wagner has developed from the ordinary representative theme found in other masters. They must be struck, in the first place, with its comprehensiveness. Almost every leading idea in the drama has a musical equivalent. Of this let us cite a few examples. The play opens in the depths of the Rhine, and the first bars give us the "motive of the primeval element." Alberich pursues the Rhine Daughters, and, enraged at their escaping him, threatens them. Straightway a "motive of menace" is heard. The fateful Ring has, of course, a theme of its own, and when Alberich, to obtain the gold, forswears love, there is a "motive of renunciation." In like manner, the music presents a "motive of love's fascination;" a "motive of a growing twilight;" motives of the "rainbow," of "the godly sword," of the "victorious call of the Wälsungs," of "presentiment," of the "question of fate," and so on to the number of ninety. It is, of course, necessary to a full comprehension and enjoyment of the music-drama that each of these ninety themes shall be identified as it occurs. The whole must, in point of fact, be committed to memory in a way peculiarly clear and strong. Were they heard only in conjunction with that which they represent, there would be no great need for this. When, for example, the dragon appears, the theme prominent in the orchestra is naturally regarded as the musical equivalent of that monstrous creature. But Wagner gives his hearer no such easy task. With extraordinary ingenuity he enters into the mind of each character, takes note of every influence, purpose, and feeling, as far as there is any relation in it to the past, and then conveys the result of his observations by a complication of the already-heard motives therewith connected. That we may not be thought to misrepresent the master, let us make an extract or two from Wolzogen's guide book. The third section (Siegfried) of the drama opens with an orchestral prelude, to understand which alone involves no small acquaintance with what has gone before, and no mean exercise of memory. Here is the explanation: "Mime in his lonely forge in the forest sits meditating about the gain of the ring through Siegfried, and about the sword which he is unable to forge for him. Therefore, at first, only the 'motive of meditation' sounds into the long dull roll of the kettledrum upon the contra-F. Then the object of his meditation announces itself in the depth by the 'motive of the rising treasure,' and, thereafter, the 'forging motive,' which henceforth sticks fast to Mime's person, sets in in a more and more persevering movement. For only by means of his smith's craft Mime may gain the sword which is to help him to the object of his meditation. Whilst again the treasure moves from below, the scourge strokes of the 'motive of bondage' drive him to his work. But this same scourge is to lead to his dominion, therefore the 'motive of bondage' turns at the culmination of the prelude into the triumphant call of Alberich sounding in victorious ff. The frequently repeated 'motive of the ring' draws a lively, glittering, and splendid picture of the hoped-for trophy. Meanwhile, the 'motive of the dragon,' who watches the treasure, begins already to wind itself on in the bass, and the 'motive of the sword,' upon which Mime's meditations and exertions are all thwarted, rises in clear C major above the menacing warbling of the last tone. The forging motive and that of bondage lead into Mime's song, in which his outbreaking wrath, his musing, and his dread are marked by the different motives of the prelude, with the only exception of the triumphant call, which here is replaced by the ambiguous 'motive of triumph,' concluding with Loge's mockery." Thus we have, in an orchestral introduction, an elaborate "argument" expressed in arbitrary language, every character of which has to be learned before the composer is understood. Again, when Siegfried, just before his death at Hagen's hands, relates how he won Brunhilde, "we hear," says our guide, "the 'forging motive,' parts of Mime's 'education song,' the flourish of the 'Sword's guardian,' the phrase of Nothung, the motives of 'meditation' and of the 'dragon,' the 'Waldweben,' accompanied by Sieglinde's 'Walsung motive,' and in rich and richer chords the melodies of the bird, and, as at last the dark harmonies of the 'cooking motive' remind the hearer of Mime's falsehood, Hagen sneeringly laughs out with the 'forging' motive, as once Alberich did." These examples will suffice to show the complicated character of Wagner's method, and the formidable obstacles it presents to those who would hear the Nibelung's Ring with perfect comprehension. Upon those obstacles, however, we do not care to dwell for the purpose of making them an argument against the work. A good thing is none the worse, but often all the better, for the pains necessary to secure it. Far more important is the fact that by this "motive" system Wagner changes the spirit and purpose of music as applied to drama. Instead of heightening the appeal of the stage to emotion, music, as he uses it, places itself before the mind to suggest related circumstances, indicate designs, foreshadow realizations, and generally to act the part of a commentator. This is the essence of the "new art" which Wagner has given Germany, and it certainly constitutes a fresh departure—leading whither? We cannot believe that the thing will take root and flourish, even in the Fatherland, where it has attained, so far, a "success of curiosity." It seems to us an unnatural employment of means bestowed for an end which we recognize by instinct rather than intellectually perceive. In other words, it is arbitrary and artificial, whereas the use of music as a vehicle of emotion is, in its elementary form, the result of an inward prompting. With the adoption of Wagner's system certain results are involved. What we know as "form" must of course go. There can be no working out of melodic ideas, no harmony of phrase with phrase, where the music, obeying a rigid law, follows the course of the poetic thought, not to heighten its expression so much as to further an intellectual perception of dramatic circumstances and conditions. We have already expressed our disbelief in the vitality of this method on æsthetic grounds, and now is the time to say that its utter unpracticalness is, perhaps, the source of greatest weakness. Imagine the result were even a composer high up in the second class to work out a music drama on Wagner's principles. It is easy to conceive the inextricable confusion in which the poor man would find himself, with an army of themes all claiming to be worked in whenever the faintest reference is made to that which they represent. Let us be assured—especially those of us who look with anxiety towards the future of lyric drama—that Wagner's method belongs to himself alone. It was born with him, and, as a method, if not as an influence, it will die with him, since there is not likely to follow the poet-composer another man so gifted; nor, assuming a successor, is it probable that he would take up and wear the Wagner mantle. We may dismiss the assumption, and ask, "Who is sufficient to carry on the work which the Nibelung's Ring exemplifies?" When Goliath of Gath fell before the stripling David, the Philistine host had not a soldier able to wield the champion's mighty spear. In like manner, when Wagner succumbs to the dart of Death—absit omen—his place will remain a void. He who doubts this should study the Nibelung's Ring, and mark the wonderful genius shown in that monumental creation; genius such as comes but once in an age. There Wagner triumphs over difficulties which he seems to have wantonly created in very pride of strength. With what astonishing ease the master marshals and manœuvres his army of motives! How subtly he interweaves them, and varies them, according to the exigencies of his plan, with never a break in the long continuity, and never a moment when the strain upon his resources seems more than they can bear. We may reject the new system as tending to put the music of lyric drama in an artificial, false, and practically impossible position; but we may not refuse our homage to the colossal genius that has conceived and worked it out. Herein, indeed, lies the consolation of some amongst us. When a power is misdirected, its very greatness gives a comfortable prospect of extinction at the death of him who wields it.

The time is close at hand for more minute criticism of the Nibelung's Ring. That the work will excite unreflecting enthusiasm in some and heedless censure in others may be taken for granted; but the bulk of the Englishmen who hear it will, no doubt, judge with sober judgment. Their verdict we dare to anticipate, and we look for a strengthening rather than a weakening of claims long conceded to the artistic forms Wagner would extinguish. The Nibelung's Ring is wonderful, and our public will look at it with curiosity and amaze; but they will go back to a form of the lyric drama which, with all its absurdities, is truer to nature and to art.

ALBANI IN THE TRAVIATA.

(From the "Morning Post.")

In making choice of the part of Violetta in La Traviata for her first appearance this season, Mdme Albani did well. She thus afforded her many admirers an opportunity of judging of the many-sided character of her abilities. Nothing could exceed the brilliancy of her vocalization, or the exquisite taste with which the difficult and trying phrases which Verdi has written, and which the genius of the artist has added, were presented to the ear. The success which followed every effort was not only well won, but it marked a gratifying encouragement that one whose career has been a series of well-directed steps on the road to that point of perfection which all desire to attain, and but few make the proper preparation to deserve. Mdme Albani is to be regarded as especially an English singer, inasmuch as her first great triumphs have been won in the metropolis, and the greatest hold upon the minds and also the affections of her hearers have been achieved in this country. Her reception on Saturday night was a tribute of welcome from those who had learned to admire the earnest, persevering, and conscientious artist, and the marvellous manner in which she sang was an acknowledgment on her part of the high value she set upon the good opinions of her British admirers. All the opportunities which Verdi has given to his heroine were taken by her as the means for the display of rare intelligence and sincere artistic power. The sympathies of the audience were secured from the outset to the end, and her essay of the part of Violetta was marked by well-studied grace and thoughtful ability. The applause with which she was rewarded was most enthusiastic, and a perfect bower of floral tributes was presented to the charming Violetta, as graceful and as welcome as the modest flower after which she is named.

STUTTGART.—Professor Giessler, lecturer on agricultural chemistry at the Polytechnic Institution, has invented a preparation for rendering wood and other materials non-combustible. The objects thus treated will never ignite, even under the intensest heat. The mixture has been adopted at the Theatre Royal.

FORM, OR DESIGN, IN VOCAL MUSIC.

The Anthem.

Many anthems are written in a single movement, and in the form of one or other of the single movements described before.

Anthems of early times vary from, perhaps, little more than a hymn tune to an elaborate composition in the imitative style of the day which we associate now with the madrigal. Such an one is the anthem of Tallis mentioned in former pages, "I call and cry to Thee." Orlando Gibbons' "Hosanna" is another example of the same kind. Of less elaborate imitation, and with occasional rhythmic phrases which give it more of a hymn-like nature, is Tallis' "If ye love me keep my commandments"; and also that attributed to Farrant of about the same date, "Lord, for Thy tender mercies' sake." Modern anthems in single movements naturally follow more modern forms.

Where greater length is necessary, the design is carried out in a series of movements closely following one another, connected by the natural sequence of musical and poetical ideas, and also by a certain relationship between the keys of the different movements. Sometimes a passage occurs of the nature of recitative, but without the passionate declamation that may be appropriate in romantic music.

In Purcell's "My beloved spake," the successive movements are all in one key, are all complete in themselves with half-way rest on the dominant, or with modulation in the middle of the movement, returning to a perfect close in the main key F; the unity of the key and the sense of the words being the only connection between the several movements.

Purcell's "O sing unto the Lord" is an anthem of many movements, all of which have a distinct and final close; and all but two of them begin and end in the major or minor form of F, the main key of the piece. The continuity of the anthem as a whole is much aided by the variation of the keys of these two movements. One of them, the third of the whole, begins in D minor and continues in F, followed by the next movement in F. The other, the fifth of the whole, begins in B flat, goes through much modulation and ends in D minor; the rest of the movements following in F minor or major. Both these movements of different key bear some resemblance to the second part or fantasia of a sonata, and, as such, tend to carry on the design of the whole anthem in the direction most natural; namely, to begin in the main key, to go abroad and to return home to the main key, to go abroad again, and again to return home.

This characteristic (of going abroad and returning again) is carried out further in Purcell's "I was glad"; and in some places the change of movement occurs within the divisions of the design, thus aiding the continuity by making the movements necessary to one another. The long symphonies for string quartet are in some places necessary parts of the design, and make the anthem a sort of forerunner of the Choral Symphony and the Hymn of Praise. The first symphony, after a few introductory bars, brings in the main subject of the first solo and comes to a close. The solo follows:

Ex. 166. I was glad,.....

After several phrases it modulates and then returns to the main key with a close. The symphony follows with a re-composition of the final phrase and a close. The next movement follows, without a stop, in the same key:

Ex. 167. Je - ru - sa - lem is built as a ci - ty and directly modulates through several keys to C, changes the movement while in C, Ex. 168. Alto, Tenor, Bass, & Cello.

testi-fy un-to Is - ra - el, and to give thanks and returns through A minor to G for the cadence of the new movement. The symphony follows with the music of the next coming solo note for note. This is a complete movement, though short, beginning:

Ex. 169.

After this it modulates and returns to G for its close. The symphony which follows this is an independent and complete movement in G minor, with modulation in the middle and closing in G minor:

Ex. 170.

Following this is a short movement of four bars in quasi recitative:

Ex. 171.

This leads into another movement in triple time in G major with modulation and with close in G minor.

Immediately after this is common time and the major form of the key for one phrase only:

Ex. 172.

followed by change of time and modulation for a second phrase, returning to G for a third phrase. The next movement acts as second part to this, and is a solo in changing keys. It is followed by a recapitulation of the last group of three phrases for chorus (see Ex. 172), and this brings the anthem to an end.

With reference to the symphonies for stringed instruments in this anthem we may quote from Pepys' "Diary," September 14, 1662: "To Whitehall Chapel. Captain Cooke's new musique. This the first day of having vialls and other instruments to play a symphony between every verse of the anthems. . . . ."—(Cummings' "Life of Purcell.")

PRESENTATION TO MR ARTHUR SULLIVAN.

On Tuesday last the professors of the National Training School for Music presented Mr Arthur Sullivan with an album containing the photographs of the professors, officials, and students who had been associated with him during the term of his holding office as Principal. A deputation of professors, including Messrs J. F. Barnett, J. Frederick Bridge, Mus. Doc., J. T. Carrodus, E. Jerningham, S. Kemp, H. Lazarus, Arthur O'Leary, J. Radcliff, Alberto Visetti, and J. B. Welch, assembled at Mr Sullivan's residence, when Signor Visetti read the following address:—

"Dear Mr Sullivan,—It is with the truest and deepest feeling of satisfaction that we have called to-day upon you, and rejoice in greeting you after your long absence. We call on you as friends and as representatives of the whole staff of professors and the whole body of students of the National Training School, and our duty is as dear to us as we hope it will be agreeable to you.

"Five years of uninterrupted intercourse with you, left in the mind and the heart of those who had the honour of belonging to that musical institution an impression that will never be effaced by time or events; the professors will never forget how gratifying it was to aid the development of youthful talent when their best efforts were always rewarded by your kind and encouraging expressions; and the pupils must always be proud of having gone through their studies under your learned and affectionate direction. We feel confident (for you have repeatedly told us so) that you also will not forget that time; but that you may have it oftener present to your mind, we ask you to accept this token of our respectful affection, assuring you that, as the likenesses contained in this album will always be the same, our feelings towards you will remain for ever unchanged."

Mr Arthur Sullivan, in reply, expressed the very great pleasure it gave him to receive such an interesting memento of his connection with the Training School. "Though averse to testimonials in general, the form which their expression of esteem had taken would, of course, allow him to accept it with unalloyed gratification. They had all reason to be very proud of the successful results of the School, and he was sure the professors would, like himself, watch with sympathetic interest the careers of those students who, by their talents and industry, had already distinguished themselves under their direction. He would always look back with pleasure to the time which had brought him into close contact with his late colleagues, enabling him, in many instances, to renew old friendships and form others which, he hoped, would be equally lasting. He would beg those present to convey to all who had contributed to this beautiful and interesting mark of their esteem his warmest and sincerest thanks."

The album, which has been manufactured by Messrs Houghton & Gunn, of Bond Street, is handsomely bound. It also contains an illuminated address and a highly tasteful frontispiece designed by Mr J. R. Clayton, in which are introduced the titles of some of Mr Sullivan's principal works.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

A work begun on Aug. 21, 1832, came to an end last night—the Sacred Harmonic Society has ceased to exist. We unfeignedly regret it, not solely because of the sentiment which makes us all dwell lovingly upon the merits of a vanished good, but because music in this country has lost one of its most useful and honoured champions. The fact is probably recognized now that the time of redemption is passed. A little of the interest shown last night by an audience that crowded the hall to the doors would, if manifested some time ago, have saved the society. One common feeling of regret pervaded the throng. But it was the vain regret which weeps a loss that might have been averted. Some may comfort themselves with the thought that the "Sacred Harmonic" lived longer than most other institutions of its kind. Granted, but we see no adequate reason for its death, unless it be—which Heaven forefend!—that English amateurs no longer regard the masterpieces of sacred music. In that case the event we now record was both natural and just. We do not want a society that is a sham. Another matter of interest helped to explain the crowd which assembled last night. We had thought that Sir Michael Costa took his leave of the society through the medium of Eli, as performed at the penultimate concert. But so rapid has been the famous conductor's recovery of late, that he was enabled to appear and see the last of an institution connected with his name since 1848. The attendance of Sir Michael was worth much more risk than he himself incurred, and showed that Fate is not always in the mood to spite a universal wish, or to ignore the fitness of things. Every one present, we undertake to say, was right glad to see the well-known figure in its accustomed place, and once more to enjoy an oratorio as given under the most potent of bâtons. Sir Michael was received in a manner that might well have affected him. Applause swelled into cheers, and waving hats and handkerchiefs supplemented the demonstration of voices as he stepped upon the platform, and again, with added vehemence, when he quitted it, after "God save the Queen" had brought the proceedings to an end. Justice was thus done, for, in his own way, Sir Michael Costa is a hero worthy of "ovation," and it must have been the remembrance of his more than thirty years' work, as well as rejoicing at his convalescence, which gave emphasis to the applause he received.

The society began with Handel fifty years ago, and ended with the same mighty master, whose Solomon was chosen for the final performance. Leaving Israel in Egypt out of the question—as was done by the directors on account of their limited resources—a better choice could not have been made. Solomon abounds in magnificent choruses of the true Handelian character—such choruses as evoked the wondering homage of the dying Beethoven, and are still the delight of amateurs, the despair of composers. Who that pretends to even an elementary acquaintance with Handel does not know them, or is unable to call over from memory the roll that begins with "Your harps and cymbals sound," continues with the exquisite "May no rash intruder," the pompous "From the censor," the wonderful series of the "Passions"—amid which "Draw the tear from hopeless love" stands like a colossus—and ends with "The name of the wicked shall quickly be past." Such works are not for an age only. Music may take this or that development as the changeful tide of men and things rolls down the centuries; but the true principles of art never vary. They confer immortal youth upon their exemplars, and of their exemplars Solomon is one. The performance, we are glad to say, was in most respects worthy of the occasion. All the choruses were given with effect, some of them, as the "Nightingale" chorus, with unwonted finish; while the solos, entrusted to Miss Anna Williams, Miss Adela Vernon, Mdme Patey, Mr Guy, and Mr Burgon, afforded no ground for any feeling but satisfaction. In the pathetic air, "Can I see my infant gored?" Miss Williams sang with true feeling. Miss Vernon's sympathetic voice and refinement of style were conspicuous in the music of the Queen of Sheba, and, as Solomon, Mdme Patey achieved a success which is both familiar and inevitable. Her delivery of the recitatives was as noteworthy as ever for declamatory power, while in the beautiful air, "What though I trace," the best of the qualities which give her distinction were displayed. Too much credit can hardly be awarded to Mr Guy for the musicianly style in which he sang the difficult tenor solos. His task was not a very grateful one, but he discharged it like an artist who, besides being skilful, is conscientious. As already mentioned, the National Anthem—Sir M. Costa's arrangement—followed the oratorio, and then, amid ringing cheers, the Sacred Harmonic Society passed into history; its work done, its honours gained. Will it have a successor? Surely, yes—one with the same mission, and differing only in the fervour which belongs to youth. While, therefore, we cry sadly, "Le Roi est mort!" we exclaim hopefully, "Vive le Roi!"—D. T.

VIENNA.—On the 19th ult., Meyerbeer's Huguenots was given at the Imperial Opera for the 100th time, the first performance having taken place in the new house on the 16th July, 1869. The cast included three "guests" or non-members of the regular company: Lilli Lehmann, from the Royal Opera, Berlin, as Marguerite de Valois; Wekerlin, from the Theatre Royal, Munich, as Valentine; and Gudehus, from the Theatre Royal Dresden, as Raoul.—Stainer, director of the Theater an der Wien, has become manager of the Carl-Theater.—Some time since the Deutsche Zeitung offered a prize of 100 ducats for the best Austro-German national hymn, Joseph Winter being the successful competitor. The paper subsequently offered the same amount for an appropriate setting of the hymn; but out of 1,320 essays forwarded by as many candidates not one has been deemed worthy.

STETTIN.—On the occasion of Götze's benefit at the Stadttheater, Marianne Brandt being advertised to appear as Fidelio, the house was crammed in every part. But the lady coming on, not in character, but ordinary costume, informed the audience that she was ill when she left Berlin that morning. Unwilling to disappoint them, however, and hoping to be better before evening, she came to proffer her own excuse. No improvement having taken place, any idea of her singing was out of the question, but she hoped the public would not make the conductor pay the penalty of her own misfortune. This appeal had its intended effect, and all the audience remained for Marschner's Hans Heiling, so Götze had his benefit after all.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The most brilliant night of the season, so far, was that of Saturday last. In the first place, the aspect of the house reminded one of the days when Italian opera really flourished as a social institution. Royalty attended in force, two double boxes being occupied by the Queen of the Netherlands, the Princess of Wales, the Duchess of Edinburgh, the Duchess of Connaught, the Princess Philip of Saxe-Coburg, and a numerous suite, while the appearance of stalls and tiers showed at a glance that the audience had a genuine right to be called fashionable and distinguished. The occasion of the gathering was not a musical novelty, since Verdi's Traviata runs Lucia and La Sonnambula hard for precedence among operas best known. But though everybody had an intimate acquaintance with the work performed, the principal artist essayed her part for the first time in London, and Mdme Albani in a new character is provocation sufficient to secure a full house. Mdme Albani may be congratulated upon the remarkable success which attended her appearance as the unfortunate Lady of the Camellias—a success never in doubt from the moment of her entry till the close of the opera. In more than one respect the assumption was notable. It gave evidence of intelligent study, independence of tradition, and a just perception of the manner in which Violetta can be represented so as to unite a measure of verisimilitude with the qualities necessary to elicit sympathy. The result was a character marked by strength of feeling amounting to passion, in itself able to explain much of Violetta's history upon which it is not needful to dwell, and making perfectly natural those later scenes that so often appear exaggerated and artificial. We sometimes see Violettas of a coldness and delicacy entirely at variance with the surroundings as well as with the nature of the personage, and, again, are presented with others so reckless that we fail to understand their association with the love that is capable of sacrifice. Mdme Albani avoided both mistakes. Her Violetta was a woman who, if beyond the pale of society, had preserved her moral sense, and her capacity for pure and disinterested affection, along with an emotional fervour which, in whatever direction moved, must necessarily exert a powerful impetus. Mdme Albani carefully presented this idea of the part from beginning to end, and brought into harmonious conjunction the reckless abandon of the first act, the noble self-sacrifice of the second, and the love until death of the third. Some points in the embodiment were new. At the parting from Alfredo, for example, the struggle to make what Violetta intended as a final adieu appear no more than a temporary leave-taking was brought into especial prominence with touching effect. Again, when Alfredo offered Violetta the crowning offence, the woman, instead of fainting right off, faced her insulter with a look of haughty indignation, and only after the coward had retreated fell slowly back into friendly arms. The final scene was very powerfully played by Mdme Albani. It was a delirium of feeling, for which the artist drew upon every power she possessed. The result may be called great, and assuredly no Violetta of recent date has enacted the dying girl with more genuine pathos and passion. As a dramatic artist Mdme Albani now stands higher in esteem than ever. Of her singing it is needless to speak at length. Enough that Verdi's always happy and often touching melodies were given with the skill and expression necessary to their full enjoyment. The artist's success with her audience was immense, applause and re-calls being the order of the evening. In other respects the performance of La Traviata, which M. Dupont conducted, called for no remark save that the new stage manager's reforming hand was pleasantly conspicuous in the second act.—D. T.

Dinorah was given on Tuesday night, with Mdme Sembrich as the heroine, and Mdme Tremelli as the Goatherd, Signors Cotogni and Frapolli as Hoel and Correntino. Aïda was produced on Thursday, with Mdme Fürsch-Madi in the title part, and a new comer, Mdlle Stahl (who made a sensible impression), as Amneris, Signor Frapolli as Radamès, and Signor Pandolfini as Amonasro. The opera attracted a large audience. This evening Faust is announced; and on Monday La Favorita, with Mdme Trebelli as Leonora, a new tenor, Signor Lestellier as Fernando, and M. Bouhy as the King.

MUNICH.—Mdme Basta, who was to play the Princess in Robert le Diable at the Theatre Royal, found herself at the last moment compelled by illness to relinquish it. No competent substitute being at hand, the opera was given without the Princess, the scenes in which she figures being omitted. (The same thing was done at Her Majesty's Theatre during the Jenny Lind furore.—Dr Blitge).

Minnie Hauk will head an English Opera Company next season in America. Among the works to be produced are English versions of Der Widerspänstigen Zähmung, Die lustigen Weiber, Tannhäuser, Lohengrin, and Mignon.

FRENCH MUSICAL FESTIVAL IN THE ALBERT HALL.

The festival and competition of French and Belgian Orpheonic Societies, held at Brighton last autumn, was not, we believe, a pecuniary success. In other ways, however, it so met the expectation of the promoters that M. de la Grave and those associated with him in directing the enterprise have resolved upon a repetition on June 20 and 21 next, changing the locale from Brighton to the Royal Albert Hall. The venture is a spirited one under the actual circumstances. In two months from the present time London will find itself at the height of the most extraordinary musical season ever known—a season already sure to present a perfect embarrassment of riches. Opera simultaneously given at three houses, a crowd of orchestral concerts, and a thousand and one entertainments of less pretensions, will join to present a distracting array of claims upon public patronage. It required no little courage to enter the lists against rivalry so formidable, but the managers of the "London French Musical Festival and Competition" are not to be deterred by any such considerations. We must admire their pluck, and own that they already deserve success.

The arrangements, generally speaking, will not differ from those of last year. Up to the present, we understand, the attendance of twenty prominent French and Belgian societies has been secured, and it is expected that at least forty additional entries will be made, the number of performers thus coming nearly up to 3,000. Upon their efforts some of our most prominent English and resident musicians have consented to sit in judgment; as, for example, Sirs J. Benedict, H. Oakeley, and G. Elevy, Messrs Randegger, Cowen, Mattei, Visetti, H. Leslie, Thorne, and Kuhe, among whose foreign colleagues will be at least three professors from the Paris Conservatoire. As last year, performances on a festival scale are prominent in the scheme, and these will certainly not prove wanting in attraction, if only because eminent artists, rarely or never heard before in England, have undertaken to appear. On this point it will suffice to mention the names of Mdlle Jenny Howe, and M. Vergnet, both of the Paris Opéra; M. Gigout, organist of St Augustine's Church; and M. Paul Viardot, the violinist. It is understood, further, that several artists prominently associated with the famous Conservatoire concerts will make their bow to an English audience. When the arrangements are complete we shall, of course, be better able to estimate the attraction offered and the probabilities of success, but even now there seems no reason why the Orpheonic Festival should not obtain an adequate share of public support. It will be somewhat of a novelty in London, and is certain to afford an excellent opportunity of learning the stage to which popular musical education has advanced amongst our neighbours across the Channel. After two days' work at the Albert Hall the Orpheonists will visit Brighton to give concerts in the Dome, and in the event of pecuniary profit resulting, half the surplus will be given to the Royal College of Music.

RICHTER CONCERTS.—The new season of these concerts began successfully in St James's Hall on Wednesday evening, the audience being large and well disposed, while the performance came quite up to general expectation. Much of the programme we can afford to dismiss in a few words. There is no need, for example, to dwell upon the peculiar march written by Wagner in honour of the German victories, and dedicated to the Kaiser, or upon the same master's overture to Tannhäuser, or upon the prelude to Der Freyschütz, or upon the "Eroica" symphony. All these works are familiar features in the repertory of the concerts, and it would be as difficult to say anything new about their execution as about themselves. The rendering of each was justly applauded; at the same time, the public should not rush to an extreme, and fancy that never was anything heard like it. We remember quite as good performances taking place before Herr Richter stepped on our shores. Rubinstein's Pianoforte Concerto in D minor (Op. 70) was the nearest approach to novelty in the programme, and acquired additional interest from the playing of Mr Eugene D'Albert, who made his first appearance after returning from Vienna. The difficult or grandiose passages of the Russian composer were attacked by Mr D'Albert with spirit and success, while the accompaniment, under Herr Richter's careful direction, was all that could have been desired. The young pianist received enthusiastic applause at the close of his task.—D. T.

Wagner's Götterdämmerung has been produced at the Stadttheater, Cologne, thus completing the series of Nibelung representations begun in the spring of 1879.

Gilmore has received, through the United States Commissioner General to the Paris Exhibition of 1878, a medal from the French Government for his concerts in the Trocadero during the Exhibition.

RICHARD WAGNER'S JUDAISM IN MUSIC.

MOTTO: "Der Jude wird verbrannt."—LESSING.

Richard Wagner, who, for some time past, has again been working at his own self-glorification, so indispensable to him, by the industrious production of pamphlets, has just published another pamphlet under the title of Das Judenthum in der Musik, Leipsic, J. J. Weber. The most abominable part of creation are the Jews, and all those are Jews who do not worship Herr Richard Wagner; this is about the leading thought of the pamphlet, which, though thin, is running over with venom. It is dedicated to Mdme Marie Muchanoff, née Countess Nesselrode, and commences with the complaint "that every one of Wagner's artistic productions always meets, in the daily press—not only of Germany, but also of France and England—with a spirit of hostility exerted for his disparagement." The source of such wide-spreading enmity Wagner has discovered to be a general and regularly organized conspiracy of the Jews against him. We are told that, in consequence of an article ("Das Judenthum in der Musik") which he published in 1850 in the Leipziger Musikzeitung, all the enemies of swine's flesh have become his enemies also, and have ever since striven in every possible manner to be revenged upon him. According to his assertion, the article created an immense sensation, though, strange to say, not R. Wagner but "K. Freigedank" was the signature appended to it, and the editor, F. Brendel, never condescended to reveal the real author! It indeed requires all Wagner's self-complacency to believe that the entire world of art and journalism is still thinking of a pseudonymous article that appeared in the Leipziger Musikzeitung nineteen years ago, and that every annoyance since suffered by him is nothing more nor less than the vengeance of the Jews on his feuilleton. I confess that it is only now, through Wagner's own pamphlet, that I knew anything of the article and of its illustrious parentage. The same is probably the case with the majority of my colleagues. But this is what Wagner will never believe; he is convinced, or, at least, pretends that he is (for one really often hesitates considering him so limited in intelligence as, in his pamphlet, he represents himself to be), that all his opponents are merely the sworn instruments bent upon carrying out the behests of a Jewish association formed to be revenged upon him. Though, from these fabulous results, we ought to conclude that the article of "K. Freigedank" is as universally known as Meyerbeer's "Prophet March," which appeared soon afterwards, Wagner considers it advisable to reprint the said article—a resolution for which we feel sincerely grateful.

He commences by attacking the Jews generally. As his object is "the justification of his invincible repugnance to everything Jewish," he of course paints without any light. The outward appearance of the Jew is a "disagreeable whim of Nature;" but, by the way, no calamity for the Jew, because "he feels very comfortable under this misfortune." On the stage it is impossible "to imagine any character, ancient or modern, represented by a Jew without involuntarily feeling the absolutely laughable inappropriateness of such an impersonation." (I wonder whether Wagner's Christian mind would really revolt at achieving success through the talent of Bettelheim, Csillag, or Sonntheim?)

The educated Jew is "the most heartless of men, and has relations only with those who need his money." (It is from such relations that Wagner appears to have derived all his knowledge of the educated Jew.) Finally the author enters upon the relations of the Jews to art. "What the educated Jew had to say when he wished to indulge in artistic utterance, could of course be only that which was unimportant and trivial, since his whole impulse towards art was luxurious and unnecessary." According to Wagner, everything a Jew does in the way of art "must necessarily have inherent to it the quality of coldness or indifference, even to triviality and ridiculousness." And what name does he mention immediately after this thesis? No less a one than that of Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, or as he with feigned sensibility says: "Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, so soon taken from us." He asserts that Mendelssohn, despite his talent, could never succeed—not even in one solitary instance—in producing upon us the profound impression, moving both heart and soul, which we expect from art. I think that thousands of my readers will agree with me when I assure Herr Wagner that the simplest of Mendelssohn's songs (not to speak of his greatest creations) makes its way more surely to "the heart and soul" than ten operas à la "Tristan und Isolde." The reader may easily imagine how loud and vehement Wagner's shouts are after Meyerbeer. Meyerbeer's art, Herr Wagner asserts, consisted only in "deceiving, a feat he accomplished by palming off upon his wearied audience the (Jewish) jargon, which we have already minutely characterized, as the modern and piquant expression of all the trivialities which, in their naked stupidity, had been so often presented to them." For Wagner (who never "deceived" the public for quite forty years with operas like Les Huguenots) Meyerbeer is a "tragico-comic phenomenon, as, indeed, generally that which leaves us cold, that which is laughable" constitutes "the distinguishing feature of Judaism." It would be only when music had fallen into a state of utter coma that Jews could enter into it. "It is not until the inward death of a body becomes manifest that the elements lying outside it gain the power of being their own masters, but merely to decompose the body; thus the flesh of the latter is resolved into a seething many-lived mass of worms." After Heine has been hissed off for his "poetic lies," and Börne applauded because he worked at the "self-annihilation of Judaism," Wagner returns to the terrible results of his pseudonymous article of the year 1850. He tells us that, owing to the many years Felix Mendelssohn worked there, "Leipsic received the real musical Judaic baptism. Leipsic is exclusively the Jewish musical capital," &c. In this disgusting, low strain, that would do honour to a fanatic mendicant friar, does the entire pamphlet continue. It is in the Jewish musical capital, therefore, that the conspiracy was then organized, "always to ignore Wagner as the author of the article," but, on the other hand, "by systematic calumny and persecution" to punish him in his literary and musical efforts. The first calumniator to come forward, in the Kölnische Zeitung, was, we are informed, Professor Bischoff, "a friend and admirer of Herr Ferdinand Hiller." (Strange to say, Hiller is not further ill-treated in the pamphlet, although he has published several admirable and crushing articles on Wagner's theories.) Then the Undersigned appeared with his "Libel" On the Musically-Beautiful. Against this denomination I must protest. My essay upon the Musically-Beautiful (the value of which Herr Wagner is, of course at liberty to fix as he pleases) is a thoroughly serious theoretical investigation, a strictly scientific endeavour to test anew, and to explain, the fundamental notions of musical æsthetics. It has never been regarded as aught else, though the merits of Wagner, as well as those of other composers, are discussed therein. Had I desired to write a libel against Wagner, I should have been able to find another and a more piquant title, in the style of his last pamphlet; as, for instance, Der Grössenwahnsinn in der Musik. That, among the representatives of genuine musical beauty, I mentioned, after Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven, the Jewish Mendelssohn, so excites Herr Wagner's bile that he is seduced into making the stupid assertion that, merely to raise Mendelssohn with a "certain manner upon the throne, I placed a few specimens of Christian nobility, such as Robert Schumann, by his side." It is from the essay, On the Musically-Beautiful, that, we are told, the whole amount of subsequent misfortune resulted: "The author had attained universal respect, and made himself a position which gave him importance, when he, an æsthetician whom people wonderingly admired, now appeared as critic in the most widely-read political paper, and declared my artistic efforts null and void." My "nimbus," he says also, is the reason that, wherever newspapers are read in the world, one particular tone has become the rule in speaking of him, a tone which Mdme Muchanoff, née Countess Nesselrode, has been so astonished to meet with everywhere. I must, in return, inform Herr Wagner that he estimates far too highly the influence of my criticisms, and assigns me an amount of importance that I am very far from possessing. Mine is merely one voice amongst many voices, but, be it observed, voices which are independent and the exponents of sincere convictions. Why does not Herr Wagner name our most celebrated musical writer, Otto Jahn, whose criticisms on Tannhäuser and Lohengrin surpass, in crushing power, all I ever wrote about him? Why does he not name Speidel and Scheller of Vienna, who—though as little Jews as I am myself—have not treated him in a manner one iota more Christianlike than I have? Very recently, Herr Lübke, the art-historian, spoke with charming humour, in a similar strain of him, being naturally in Stuttgardt immediately matriculated a Jew for so doing. Why does not Wagner remember that clever writer, Hinrichs, who, at first, advanced to meet him with warm sympathy, but the longer he wrote, and the more carefully he studied Wagner's operas, became colder and colder, so that the "loyal Brendel" would not accept his last articles. But Wagner expressly complains of Adolphe Stahr, and Robert Franz, who, in the summer of 1850, once, "though exactly only once," espoused his cause! I, too, am reproached with the "almost enthusiastic partiality" which I at first felt for him, but which I now feel no longer. My worthy Herr Wagner, the same thing has happened to a great many others. I never denied the strong impression, nor have I ever been ashamed of it, which was produced upon me, when a young student in Dresden, by the dazzling performance of Tannhäuser. I sent a notice of it to the Wiener Musikzeitung, and, though rather lavish in its praise, the notice exhibited anything but blindness to the numerous weak points in the opera. That, at a period when the name of Richard Wagner was not known in Austria, I happened to be the first who spoke publicly in terms of warm admiration of Tannhäuser, is a fact that gives me satisfaction even now.* My mistake consisted merely in the sanguine belief that, in his subsequent operas, Wagner would raise and refine to clearer and clearer beauty those elements which are full of charm and purport in Tannhäuser, and that, at the same time, he would reject what was unmusical, unhealthy, and trivial, though cleverly disguised. The reverse has come to pass; every succeeding opera has become more unmelodious, more wearisome, more noisy, and abstruse. Just in the same way, his pamphlet grows more passionate, more spiteful, and more mendacious at every page. The one lie, my pretended "Judaism," I will overlook, in consideration of the blind rage of a man, who like the Rabbin in Heine's Disputation, always goes about with a small naked knife, in order murderously to hack harmless Christians who may pass him. The second lie does not concern me alone. Wagner asserts, the reader must know, that Theodor Vischer (whom he has the impertinence to dub "an amiable and perfectly blond German Æsthetician"), confided to me the execution of the musical part of his Æsthetik, and deduces from this relation of ours to each other fresh conclusions in explanation of my "rapid celebrity," &c. As we must in justice assume that Herr Wagner has had in his hands at least once this Æsthetik of Vischer's, since he so depreciates it, it cannot possibly have escaped his notice that the whole of the musical portion (with the exception of a few paragraphs written by Vischer himself), is due to Professor Karl Köstlin, of Tübingen, a man known as a thorough musician and philosopher, and not only no Jew, but actually a Protestant clergyman.

According to Wagner, it is impossible to estimate too highly the incalculable influence, still at work, of the pseudonymous Jew-Article of 1850; he assures us: "What Liszt, too, had to undergo, was attributable to this article!" The reader perceives that Wagner is becoming a perfect child. The "defection," also, of Joachim (whose truthful, artistic nature could no longer put up with the humbug of the Music of the Future), Wagner explains as a consequence of the influence exerted by his Jewish shield of Medusa. In Paris and London, moreover, the same "organized conspiracy" existed against him (of course, people there had nothing more pressing to do than to read the Leipziger Musikzeitung of 1850). He accounts for the universal antipathy with which he met in London, "by the peculiar character of the English religion, which is based more upon the Old than upon the New Testament." After having thus waged war with the papers, Wagner, not abandoning his fixed idea for a single moment, proceeds to attack theatrical managers. "You already perceive," he says, apostrophizing Mdme Muchanoff, née Countess Nesselrode, "that, while my former operas made their way into nearly all German theatres, each of my more recent works meets with a sluggish, nay, hostilely rejectful behaviour in the self-same theatres; the fact is, my earlier works had forced their way upon the stage before the Jewish agitation, and their success could not be greatly affected."† Such an explanation can emanate only from a person completely blinded by vanity, who never seeks in himself the cause of a failure, but always solely in the intrigues of others. Every theatrical manager who understands his business (leaving out of consideration the fact of his possessing any especial feeling for art) will be eager to produce novelties by a composer who has already written two or three operas which have successfully kept their places on the stage. In consequence of the unusual dearth of new German operas, a theatrical manager will even make many a sacrifice

* I pleaded also for the performance of Die Meistersinger in Vienna, not that I considered it a masterpiece, but because of all the German operas which have been produced for some time past, it is the most interesting and most original, and, therefore, the public ought not to be deprived of the chance of becoming acquainted with it.

to secure such novelties. If, in spite of this, he does not venture on them, he must have come to the conviction that they do not hold out the promise of success, or, at least, not of such a success as will repay him for his trouble and expense. When warm advocates of Tannhäuser protest against music like that in Tristan und Isolde, the reason of their so doing exists wholly and solely in Tristan und Isolde itself; and when a theatrical manager asserts he can cast and get up Der fliegende Holländer and Lohengrin tolerably well, but could never manage Die Meistersinger or Die Nibelungen, here again the blame rests solely and wholly with Die Nibelungen and Die Meistersinger. It is not every theatre which, like the Royal Operahouse, Munich, can maintain an expensive clinical staff of accoucheurs simply for Richard Wagner. Wagner allows himself to be so carried away by his passion as to make the exceedingly impertinent assertion that he perceived, in his correspondence with the persons at the head of the Court Operahouses in Vienna and Berlin, "from the dodges employed by them, that it was not merely their wish not to be under the necessity of producing the Meistersinger, but, moreover, to hinder its being given at other theatres." As regards the Imperial Operahouse, Vienna, I am in a position to assure Herr Wagner of the contrary. The management was only waiting for permission to make the most necessary cuts; and very rightly, for no sensible manager would ever inflict upon his public an opera of such preposterous and somniferous length. Wagner, however, takes some credit to himself for the fact "that he has now made certain stipulations never previously considered necessary for his permission to produce a new work." The "mingling of the Jewish element in our artistic affairs" appears in this case, therefore, to emanate from himself, I think.—After giving Fröbel (who has broken so many lances in his defence) a kick, as he goes by, Wagner suddenly stumbles over the name of Robert Schumann. Of course, something injurious must be said of him—but it is not so easy to do so. . . . . All right! Wagner has hit upon it. "Compare," he says to Mdme Muchanoff, née Countess von Nesselrode, "the Robert Schumann of the first half of his productivity with the Robert Schumann of the second: there plastic fashioning impulse; here, a subsiding into bombastic flatness." And what is the reason of this? Was not it, as we previously thought, Schumann's nervous illness, and the overclouding of his mind, which soon met with so fearful a conclusion in his tragic end? Not a bit of it! Wagner assures us that the reason of the decline in Schumann's productive power must be sought in the influence exerted "by the mingling of the Jewish element." Up to this point the predominant feeling excited by the pamphlet is one of ridiculousness; but this feeling is now converted into absolute disgust. We shut the repulsive book, which will hardly gain its author many friends, or create many enemies for the Jews. As a guide to Wagner's character, it possesses only a psychological interest. In it unbounded self-adoration has attained a height, on which a man with his brains in healthy working order could never breathe. We are involuntarily compelled to think of R. Wagner's predecessor in the Old Testament,—King Nabuchodonezzar, who believed so long that he was a god, that he turned himself into a mere ordinary ox, eat hay, and was set to music by Verdi.

EDUARD HANSLICK.

SARAH BERNHARDT passed through Madrid on her way from Lisbon to Barcelona.

BAYREUTH.—In a letter addressed to Hans von Wolzogon, editor of the Bayreuther Blätter, Wagner unfolds his intentions as to this year's performances of Parsifal, and likewise as to those to be given every year afterwards, in perpetuum. The oracle also expresses a hope that a "school" (on Wagnerian principles, of course), may be the issue.

BERLIN.—Carlotta Grossi, formerly of the company at the Royal Operahouse, subsequently engaged at Vienna, will re-appear for a limited period. (Well remembered by Maplesonian opera-goers.—Dr Blidge.) Carnevalfest, a new ballet, from the pen of Emil Hartmann, Copenhagen, has been successfully performed in the Concerthaus, by Bilse's Orchestra.

MOSCOW.—During the time of the Exhibition—from the 15th May to the 15th September—the Russian Musical Society intend giving a series of ten concerts at which only works by Russian composers will figure, the conductors being Anton Rubinstein, Davidoff, Rimsky-Korsakow, Balakirew, and Hubert; director of the Conservatory. Rubinstein, who is to conduct at the first three concerts, has written an overture in which a number of well-known popular Russian national airs are "worked up." Tschaikowsky has composed an "Ouverture solennelle" for two orchestras.

ALEXANDRA PALACE.—The first grand festival of the new company's second season was inaugurated on Saturday last under very inauspicious circumstances. The weather reminded one more of March than of April. Notwithstanding boisterous wind, much rain, and leaden skies through which the sun struggled in vain to gain the mastery, a very large gathering mustered on the occasion, the principal attraction being a grand performance of Mr Carter's sacred cantata, Placida, the Christian Martyr, and Rossini's Stabat Mater, with the following artists: Mdme Christine Nilsson, Miss Patti Winter, Mdme Antoinette Sterling, Mr Edward Lloyd, Mr George Cox, Mr James H. Ley, and Signor Foli. Mr Edward Bending presided at the organ. Mr Carrodus was leader of the orchestra. The united chorus and band, numbering 1,000, was conducted by Mr Carter. Produced some ten years ago, it is questionable whether the cantata was ever so ably rendered as on this occasion. No exception could be taken to any of the artists, but special circumstances lent an attraction to Mdme Christine Nilsson, which rendered the performance one of more than usual interest. Clad in deepest mourning, pale as marble, and showing evidence of her recent heavy bereavement, the great Swedish soprano looked, if possible, more fascinating than ever. The Placida of the cantata was realized in a manner so remarkable that the audience gave spontaneous vent to their sympathy in one long-sustained burst of admiration, renewed again and again throughout the performance, as the great singer, with inspired fervour, threw heart and soul into the part of the martyred Placida. Ably as the other singers rendered their parts, the feeling was overpowering that the interest centred in Mdme Nilsson. Nor can this be regretted, artistically, for, after all, the halo of the martyr's crown ought to be focussed, as it were, on the Roman maiden who gave up sweet life for her Christianity. The performers throughout were much applauded, encores being, as a rule, declined; there was, however, no resisting the demand for a repetition of the Processional March. In the Stabat Mater of Rossini, which followed, the same artists again appeared, Miss Patti Winter being added as a relief to Mdme Nilsson in the concerted music. Miss Winter's clear, resonant soprano voice seemed admirably adapted for such a concert-room, and could not fail to be heard throughout the vast space. Mr Carter's choir, in the music of the maestro, did not acquit themselves so well as in their conductor's cantata. There was an occasional want of precision, and two instances of very faulty attack. Experienced choristers ought to find no difficulty in looking at their music, and, at the same time, keeping an eye upon the beat. On the other hand, conductors would do well, even at rehearsals, if they avoided making the beat heard. Once accustom a choir to listening for the beat, they will soon give up looking at it. Upon the whole, however, the performance was a most creditable one. We need scarcely add that the band was admirably led by Mr Carrodus.—W. H.

HACKNEY CHORAL ASSOCIATION.—The spacious and handsome Town Hall of Shoreditch was crowded on Monday evening, when the musical society above-named gave its last concert for the season. A special attraction had been provided, in the shape of a new cantata, Alfred; poem by Mr W. Grist, music by Mr E. Prout, who has conducted the performances of the Hackney Choral Association since its establishment, some years ago. Much interest was, of course, felt in the work by those locally concerned, and by many who, recognizing Mr Prout as a very able musician, came from a distance to gratify their curiosity. We may say at once that, by the result, interest was justified and curiosity rewarded. The cantata is styled "dramatic," which term the nature of its structure warrants only by a stretch of courtesy. Very little action enters into the story, and the lyric element nearly everywhere predominates. We do not quarrel with this, especially as Mr Grist writes verses which are far above those ordinarily found in works of the kind, and some of which rise into the region of poetry. But it may be doubted whether so marked an absence of dramatic interest tended in favour of Mr Prout, who has not been able to avoid a certain monotony. For some of this he alone is responsible. He might have more distinctly characterized the music of the Danes and Saxons with a view to contrast of style. True they were kindred peoples, but in the fact that the Saxons were Christians and the Danes heathens lies provocation enough to dissimilarity of musical expression. It would, however—looking at the general merit of the work—be ungracious to complain against Mr Prout on any such ground as that just stated. The story, we need hardly say, deals with the venture of Alfred into the Danish camp, and his subsequent victory over those troublesome invaders. The first scene shows the dispersal of the defeated Saxons at the command of their king, and Alfred's resolution, inspired by the cheering words of his queen, Alswitha, to venture upon a desperate deed. The carrying out of that resolve is shown in the second scene, a leading feature being a contest of song between Alfred and Guthrum, the Danish chief, one taking as his theme love, the other war, love being, of course, the conqueror. Finally we witness the return of the triumphant Saxons with their prisoners, all of whom agree to adopt Christianity and live under Alfred's rule. Mr Prout has treated this heroic subject in a style that pleases by an absence of affectation and by the presence of a good deal of sound musicianship. We had occasion to say some time ago that he was driving a pair along the bye-roads leading to Bayreuth, but that one of his horses jibbed. Here no such remark is possible. Mr Prout's course, in Alfred, lies on the broad and beaten track of art, and if we may continue the figure—the cattle pull together in perfect amity. His recitative, perhaps, invites the observation that it conforms too much to an antique model, but the fault, if fault it be, is a good one, especially as times go. In point of melody, both songs and choruses are well provided. The themes are clearly marked and expressive, having obviously arisen in the composer's mind from his study of the text and not arbitrarily. We are, however, disposed to accept as the most striking feature in Alfred the manner in which it is scored for orchestra. Mr Prout's acquaintance with the resources of instrumentation is here conclusively displayed, the listener's interest never flagging. We might give instance after instance of well-judged effect, but enough if we mention with special approval the scoring of the Saxon chorus, "Weary and war-wasted," and of Alfred's dirge, "Wail, my harp, in saddened strain." Here we see the hand of a master, and recognize that the force of the picturesque in music could hardly farther go. An occasion will doubtless present itself for fuller details; meanwhile, it may go forth that a cantata honourable to native talent has appeared. The performance was throughout excellent, Miss Marriott, Mr Shakespeare, and Mr King doing justice to the solos, while band and chorus vied with each other in the discharge of a task to which they were more than competent. We may add that the conspicuous numbers were lustily applauded, and that Mr Prout himself came in for great honour. In the remainder of the programme were Mozart's G minor symphony, and the "Benediction of the Daggers" from Les Huguenots.—D. T.

Symphony Concerts.—The series of concerts announced for this season at St James's Hall under the above title was inaugurated on Monday evening in a most successful manner, except in one particular—the audience was hardly as numerous as could have been desired, notwithstanding the example set by their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh, who honoured the occasion with their presence. The instrumentalists, selected from the Manchester and Crystal Palace bands, with the large chorus, numbered 300 performers, who, under the direction of Mr Charles Hallé, carried out a programme of surpassing quality. Doubts, if any existed, as to the merits of the orchestra were dispelled by the masterly interpretation of Cherubini's overture to Anacreon, which opened the concert. The just balance of the constituent parts of string, wood, and brass, their quality and power, were made manifest in the work of the Italian master, with its grandiose introduction, and its allegro abounding in devices of extended crescendos, long fiddle passages, and prolonged trills. Of a very different order was the next number in the programme—Rubinstein's Concerto in G major, No. 3 (Op. 45), for pianoforte and orchestra. Here, in conjunction with Mdme Sophie Menter, the band had to set forth the newest phase of musical thought, the most advanced method of utterance. The difference in the two works might be seen in the concluding passages of each; the older composer, striking some noble chords, seems to make in retiring a stately bow; the younger, as if in delirious passion, gives vent, by one last bursting cry, to emotions no longer endurable. In the concerto Rubinstein has, in many respects, kept well within the boundaries observed by his predecessors. In the third movement, Allegro risoluto, there is, however, a marked tendency to wander in devious tracts; but the composer probably felt that his principal theme was not altogether free from commonplace, and the strivings manifest might be, therefore, the effect of an intense desire and ardent purpose to mass the materials so that the movement might culminate in an exalted climax. This unsatisfied and impatient spirit was also discernible in the first division of the concerto, Allegro moderato. Between the two Allegros comes an Andante of considerable beauty, enhanced on Monday night by the extraordinary talents of Mdme Sophie Menter. The fair artist seemed burthened with the sentiment of the tender phrases, and lovingly gave it utterance. The first subject was particularly caressed, now playfully, now mournfully, and now passionately. But the entire performance of the great pianist was little short of marvellous. Such strength, such attack, accuracy, and brilliancy are seldom met with in conjunction. The audience, unchilled by paucity of numbers, applauded the lady with enthusiasm. Brahms' variations for orchestra on a theme of Haydn's "Chorale St Antoni," can scarcely be called a novelty, inasmuch as it has been heard at the Crystal Palace and elsewhere; but some time may elapse before it becomes a familiar item in our concert programmes. In it there is certainly no absence of technical skill, for every variation is marked by that supreme mastery over a simple theme, that power of transposing a given subject into a thing of elaborate beauty, which only the great musician commands. Brahms has taken the melody of Haydn, as one at the forge would take a bar of metal to fashion it into ornaments of divers form and character. Now it is attenuated, now consolidated; now it glows with fervid heat, and anon spreads out into sparkling devices. Haydn's tune, by the fire of the younger composer's genius, is rendered, as it were, malleable, and by scientific skill wrought into complex forms. Beethoven's colossal Choral Symphony occupied the second part of the concert. A few years back no one had the temerity to fortell that a work, then considered incomprehensible, would become really familiar. Yet so it is. To many present on Monday night it was the best-known work in the programme, and to those it undoubtedly proved the greatest delight. Little else than praise can be awarded to the band and chorus for the fine interpretation given; the chorus was unusually able; and the trying high notes were attacked with zeal and success. The soloists were Miss Anna Williams, Miss Orridge, Mr Vernon Rigby, and Mr Santley, of whom the last-named had previously given an excellent reading of the bass air, "Der Kriegeslust ergeben," from Spohr's Jessonda. Mr Charles Hallé conducted throughout the evening with unfailing skill and energy. —P.G.

The third of a series of Smoking Concerts of the Regency Club took place on Thursday, 27th ult. The chair was taken by Mr Thomas P. Chappell, president of the club, supported by the energetic chairman of committee, Mr M. Maybrick. Owing to some difficulty having arisen to prevent the use of the electric light, the concert-room was on this occasion elegantly illuminated by several candelabra, supplied by Messrs Tansley. About 200 members were present, amongst whom were Messrs Henry Irving, George Grossmith, Herman Franke, Oscar Beringer, E. J. Odell, Rutland Barrington, Herbert Standing, G. Ghilberti, Musin, &c. Messrs Edward Lloyd and C. Santley were prevented by professional engagements from being present. The following was the programme:—

Pianoforte Duet, "Mendelssohn's Wedding March," Herr Oscar Beringer and Mr Maybrick; Song, Patria (Tito Mattei), Signor Ghilberti; Quartet, in D, for strings (Haydn), Herr Herman Franke, Herr Jung, Herr Krause, and Mr Ould; Song (Schubert), Herr Julius Franke; Pianoforte Solo, (a) Serenade (Rubinstein), (b) Polonaise (Liszt), Herr Oscar Beringer; Song, "In sheltered vale," Mr Maybrick; Song, "The little hero" (S. Adams), Mr Maybrick; Quintet (Schumann), Herr Oscar Beringer, Herr Franke, Herr Jung, Herr Krause, and Mr Ould; Song, J. B. Croft; Recitation from Two Gentlemen of Verona, E. J. Odell; Serio-Comic Song, "The Cruise of the Calabar," Mr E. J. Odell; Song, "Qui Vive," Signor Ghilberti; Recitation, "The level crossing" (Sims), Mr J. Fernandez; New Musical Sketch, Mr G. Grossmith; Song, "The Captain of the Pinafore," Mr Rutland Barrington; Imitations of popular actors, Mr Herbert Standing; Musical Sketch, "Of people who can't sing and will," Mr G. Grossmith; Recitation, "O villanous ambition," Mr E. J. Odell; Recitation, "My Lord Tom Noddy," Dr Evan Jones.

The entertainment closed with a vote of thanks to the chairman, proposed by Mr Philip Waterlow.

Mr Gustave Pradeau gave the second of his pianoforte recitals on Tuesday afternoon, May 2, at the New Town Hall, Kensington, and, as upon the former occasion, a considerable assemblage, consisting chiefly of ladies, was present to hear him play a miscellaneous series of pieces by Stephen Heller, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Beethoven, and Chopin. Mr Pradeau is an executant of irrepressible vigour, and in certain of his performances an abatement of physical force would be welcome. That he has an enormous command over the instrument is undeniable, but the lack of something of the nature of temperance in the more emphatic necessities of the moment is a defect of so easy avoidance that its correction may be suggested without apology. Not only is the ear startled by this ultra vehemence of style, but the eye half looks for sparks from the instrument itself. The magnificent "Waldstein" sonata of Beethoven, which constituted the most important feature of the programme, suffered considerably from this disposition to attain sonorous rather than pleasurable effects; otherwise the performance might have taken creditable rank as a pianoforte reading. Stephen Heller was represented by the first of his "Promenades d'un Solitaire" and the third of his "Nuits Blanches"; Mendelssohn by a pair of his "Songs without words" and his Capriccio in E minor; Schumann by his occasional pieces "Au soir" and "Pourquoi," and his fifth "Novellette"; and Chopin by a Scherzo, a Mazurka, a Nocturne, a Polonaise, and a Valse.—H.

THE fourth, and last, of Messrs Carl Weber and Alex. Kummer's Concerts of Chamber Music took place at the Royal Academy of Music on Wednesday evening. Beethoven's Trio, in B flat, Op. 37; Brahms' Sonata, in G, Op 78, for pianoforte and violin; and Goetz' Quartet, in E major, Op. 6, were the principal pieces given. Herr Kummer's violin solos were a romance by Edwin Shute, and an Introduction and Gavotte by Franz Ries. Mons. B. Albert played a Salon-Stücke (No. 3, in A major) by Rubinstein; and Herr Carl Weber a pianoforte solo. Mrs Hutchinson varied the programme with Lieder, by Goetz, and a "Solvejg Lied," by Grieg. Mr Harvey Löhr accompanied. The concert was well attended, and was much enjoyed.

MISS BLANCHE NAVARRE'S announcement of her first annual concert had the effect of filling the Marlborough Rooms. The names of Miss Damian, Mr Isidore de Lara, Mr Thorndike, Mr George Grossmith, and other popular artists figured in the programme; and though some of the promised talent was not forthcoming at the proper moment, the concert on the whole was very successful. Indeed, after listening to a series of vocal and instrumental pieces for upwards of two hours, the audience were still so unwilling to go away that it was found necessary to play "God save the Queen" in order to make it clearly understood that the entertainment was at an end. Miss Navarre's greatest success was achieved in the very brilliant, very difficult, and (must it be said?) slightly antiquated "Una voce," from Il Barbiere. Miss Navarre possesses the rare faculty of being able to sing in tune. Her voice, moreover, is of charming quality; and it has gained considerably of late in strength. Mr Isidore de Lara sang very effectively two songs of his own composition, and Mr George Grossmith caused endless laughter in a new scene which he had written specially for the occasion.

PROVINCIAL.

BANBURY.—A concert, under the auspices of the Mechanics' Institute, was held lately in the Exchange Hall. The platform was prettily decorated with plants, &c., by Messrs Windsor, Strange, and Macnaughton. The performers were—Mdlle Doré Desvignes, Mr Alfred Hemming, Herren Carl Henkel, Otto Leu, and Oberthür, together with Misses Fortescue and Jessie Davis. The programme contained many interesting compositions, including Oberthür's trio for violin, violoncello, and harp; Handel's "Largo," for violin, harmonium, and harp; Oberthür's duet, for two harps, on Les Huguenots; and his concertino for harp alone. Gounod's Meditation (on Bach's first prelude), for violin, harmonium, and harp, was also given, and was capitally played by Miss Fortescue, Herren Henkel, and Oberthür. The singers were all in excellent voice, and were ably accompanied on the pianoforte by Miss Jessie Davis.

SOUTHSEA.—Miss Clara Latham had a concert at the Portland Hall, on Thursday evening, April 27th, under the patronage of the Mayor, Admiral Ryder, Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar, Sir H. Drummond Wolff, and the Hon. T. C. Bruce. The singers were—Mdme Adeline Paget, Miss Clara Latham, Messrs Edward Lloyd, and Alfred Moore; the instrumentalists—Mr Charles Oberthür (harp), and Mr George Gear (pianoforte). The successes of the concert were obtained by Mr Edward Lloyd in Mr Gear's song, "My Lady sleeps," and Ascher's romance, "Alice, where art thou?" both of which were encored; Miss Paget in the "Jewel song," from Faust (encored); Miss Latham, in Michael Watson's "A Winter Story" (encored); Mr. George Gear in two of his own compositions (re-called); and Mr Oberthür, in his musical illustration, "Clouds and Sunshine (encored, and his "Cascade" substituted). We must not omit to state that Mr Alfred Moore was called upon to repeat Mr Hutchinson's "Ehren on the Rhine." The concert was well attended, and was thoroughly enjoyed.

DUBLIN.—The concert given at the Exhibition Palace on Monday evening, May 1, by Mr Mapleson and Messrs Cramer was of interest. Mdme Roze-Mapleson, whose popularity seems to increase every day, was the attraction, and those who expected a musical treat were not disappointed. The other vocalists—Mdlle Le Brun, a young French contralto, Messrs Frank Boyle, and Arthur Oswald—were new to Dublin, as well as Signor Mora, the pianist. M. Buzian was the violinist. The concert began with a duet for violin and pianoforte, Mdme Roze-Mapleson then gave the grand scena, "Softly sighs," (Der Freischütz), with great effect. Her singing, afterwards, of Gounod's "Ave Maria," brought down an enthusiastic "encore," the violin obbligato part being admirably played by M. Buzian. Mdme Roze, whose ballad-singing is not her least accomplishment, evidently touched all hearts with her rendering of "The Harp that once through Tara's Halls," and the "Last Rose of Summer" which she gave for encore. Mdlle Le Brun acquitted herself satisfactorily in "Ah mon fils," Le Prophète, and "Il segreto per esser felice," (encored).

RICKMANSWORTH.—On Wednesday afternoon a festival service was held in the old parish church, in which the choir, numbering over fifty voices, took part. Sir George Elvey, Mus. Doc., Oxon, of Windsor Chapel-Royal, was the organist. The Hon. Victoria Grosvenor, eldest daughter of Lord Ebury, Moor Park, conducted the choir, and the Rev. Canon Nisbet, rector of St Giles's-in-the-Fields, Bloomsbury, London, preached.

ALEXANDRA PALACE.

Attractions of a more than ordinary character, at the Alexandra Palace, proved a match for the boisterous and forbidding weather of Saturday, which, instead of keeping the public away from this popular resort, seemed to drive them into it. In celebration of the first summer-anniversary of the present management, a grand musical festival was added to the programme of the day; and the second season was thus inaugurated in a manner highly creditable to the liberality and enterprise of the lessees. The sacred cantata, Placida, the Christian Martyr, composed by Mr William Carter, and produced ten or eleven years ago, had the advantage of being sung by artists all of whom are eminently qualified for their tasks. The Roman maiden who, impressed by the fervid devotion of her slave, Bertha, embraces Christianity was represented by Mdme Christine Nilsson, who succeeded in realizing the dramatic character as effectively as she interpreted the music assigned to the part. Mr Edward Lloyd, as the patrician Roman father, also sang most impressively; and Mdme Sterling threw all her wonted power into the personation of the Christian bondswoman. Signor Foli was the Priest, Fabian, by whom Placida is baptized; and the characters of Nero, the Emperor, and Rufus, a friend of Metellus, were respectively embodied by Mr James H. Ley and Mr George Cox. Hardly necessary is it to say that the presence of the great Swedish singer at the Alexandra Palace was of itself an event calculated to induce a large attendance even at the increase from a shilling to half-a-crown in the price of admission. On the other hand, there was a meteorological condition so adverse that it could not but have shaken the best-founded hopes of success. Comforting, therefore, was it to find, when Mr Carter's sacred work began, that the ample hall was remarkably well filled by an audience ready to appreciate the musical treat provided for them, and apparently in no wise disconcerted by the untoward weather which they had braved in order to enjoy a performance of such quality as that promised by the management. The overture, which was played by an efficient force of instrumentalists, conducted by Mr W. Carter, evoked a sympathetic burst of applause; and this auspicious beginning was followed by signs of general favour, which increased as the performance proceeded. The chorus and band together were a thousand strong, the latter body having for leader Mr Carrodus. As soon as Mdme Nilsson, who wore a dress wholly composed of black crape, came upon the platform, the warm plaudits which had greeted the appearance of Mdme Antoinette Sterling and Mr Edward Lloyd deepened in volume to a perfect storm, and this enthusiastic reception was acknowledged with grateful signs by the distinguished vocalist. Her singing of the celestial air, "There is a gem," created a deep impression; but encores were avoided throughout, with the single exception of the processional march, the repetition of which was so loudly and unanimously called for that the demand could not well be refused. Mdme Nilsson's other airs, and especially "Yes, to a bright and glorious life," were all received with marked signs of approbation; and so was her duet with Mdme Sterling, "O magnify the Lord with me," which, with its chorus, "God's mercy is on them that fear Him," ends the first scene. The music falling severally to the lot of Mr Lloyd and Signor Foli produced its due effect upon the audience; and in short the entire performance of the cantata, including the organ music played by Mr Bending, fell evidently on ears ready to be pleased and in no single instance disappointed. In the Stabat Mater of Rossini, which followed. Mdme Christine Nilsson, Mdme Antoinette Sterling, Mr Edward Lloyd, and Signor Foli again appeared; and they were joined by Miss Patti Winter, whose soprano was of service in taking some weight of labour from Mdme Nilsson.—*D. SCHWERIN.—A provisional building will be run up for use until another Grand-Ducal Theatre can be raised on the site of the one recently burnt down. The Grand-Duke has announced that he will not avail himself of the clause by which the destruction of the theatre by fire rendered the engagements of artists null and void. Some thirty members of the chorus, men and women, have been agreeably surprised by being engaged to sing in German opera at Drury Lane. Each lady receives 350 marks salary, with free passage to London and back. The Grand-Duke has, moreover, made each of them a present of 100 marks for articles of costume.

THE MUSICAL EAR.

SIR,—I should like to be permitted to make a few comments upon an article which appeared in the Globe some time since, under the above heading. The musical ear, as it appears to me, is not so much a faculty given to the few as a qualification that can be acquired by the many. Granted that some find little or no pleasure in listening to the finest music, I think it will be found in most instances that these few have had little or no opportunity of hearing anything but the lowest forms of music. Musical enthusiasm is not so much an original state as a cultivated condition, and I do not believe that many people exist to whom music is really unpleasant if they have only lived in an atmosphere of harmony. There are, it is true, a small minority who can hardly distinguish one musical sound from another, and there are also some so delicately organized that musical combinations make upon them powerful impressions, even at a very early age; but these are generally the children of musical people, where music has been heard even from the cradle.

Of those who are supposed to possess "no ear," I can enumerate many examples, and I can support the statement made in the article alluded to, that some who are engaged in tuning instruments can do so perfectly, although they cannot hum even the most commonplace tune. I knew one man who was regarded as a quick and accurate tuner at a large pianoforte manufactory who not only could not hum a tune, but really could not distinguish one melody from another. His delicate perception as a tuner was undoubtedly acquired by practice.

But I will take the ordinary class of listeners who have no theoretical knowledge of music, and give them examples of the highest forms—Beethoven's symphonies, for instance—and they shall gradually become as sensible of their beauties, so far as influence on the senses goes, as the best-read musicians. I once heard the remark made by a visitor at a concert:—"It is true I have heard the 'Pastoral' and the C minor symphony of Beethoven several times, and I can really appreciate their beauties, but the other seven only bore me." "My good friend," was the reply, "if you continue to hear the seven you cannot understand, they will in time all be equally dear to you." I have noticed the same remark made about the works of Schubert, and more particularly Schumann, but I am prepared to assert that all these will afford gratification for the million if they are only made sufficiently familiar. I am frequently incensed at an observation commonly made by vocalists (who, as a rule, seldom listen to instrumental compositions), that audiences generally listen to them as a "fashion." I have over and over again insisted that if the ears of a people continue to be nourished with good music, their fondness for it will increase, and that the taste for vulgar compositions will cease. We shall always have exceptions, as we have in every other taste, and perhaps it is well that it should be so; but do not try to make it appear that greatness in the musical, as in every other art cannot be appreciated through increasing familiarity.

We have some whose organization is so distinctly delicate that music comes to them as their natural food. I have known very young pupils so alive to musical impression that, upon a first hearing, the most difficult symphonies have become intelligible to them, and they will be able to pick up every theme and, indeed, repeat it, although but once heard.

The power to make a musical note is, as the writer I have alluded to very properly remarks, no guide to musical taste or ear. The act is purely mechanical, and he must be a very remarkable master who can tell upon a first hearing whether a pupil has any aptitude. In nine cases out of ten I should say they will be wrong. I knew a young gentleman who was placed under one of the first provincial professors, and was afterwards heard by several distinguished vocalists, and they all decided that he had neither a note in his voice nor the smallest capacity for music; and yet this same gentleman became one of the most distinguished vocalists of the day, and held that position for more than a quarter of a century. Some critics also who are conversant with every description of musical work are unable to give the most elementary illustration even of the simplest theme. When the performance is once commenced they can follow it note by note; but to give any illustration is out of their power.

In conclusion, let us say that as we have acquired tastes such as distinguish the epicure for olives, caviare, sauerkraut, &c., &c., so we may have an acquired taste for unnatural musical combinations; and on these grounds only can I account for the preference given to certain classes of so-called music outraging all our notions of harmonious propriety. THE NIBELUNG'S RING.

I.—The Rhinegold.

Germany's "new art" was revealed on Friday night, May 5th, to an audience not crowded, but interested beyond common. The interest we need not explain. A thing so much debated as the fullest development, for the present, of Wagnerian lyric drama, and so renowned as the great trilogy of Bayreuth, is in a position to command more than the attention born of curiosity. As for such empty seats as there were, an explanation may perhaps be found in prices suggested by an extravagant idea of the power which Wagner wields in our country. Mistake on this point is easy. The thick-and-thin followers of the German master are not without influence, but their case is one of "great cry and little wool." They are so small a minority, and so many of them expect to be on the "free list," that it does not do to act upon the noise they make, albeit the yielding to such a temptation, where thought is in harmony with wish, is the most natural thing in the world. There may have been disappointment in some quarters at the lack of an overwhelming crowd, but none was possible on the score of profound attention. The Rhinegold fell, from first to last, upon ears open to its every impression, and, we will venture to say, free from any form of prejudice strong enough to affect the verdict of the majority. Nothing, indeed, could be said against the attitude of the audience. Wagner's lyric dramas have had their unhappy moments. In Paris they have recoiled before merciless ridicule; but in London their reception has always been at least polite. Some may assign the cause to the dulness of indifference; we prefer to see it in the sense of fairness which certainly was illustrated after a conspicuous manner on Friday night. Regarding preliminary matters little need be said. Herr Seidl, the conductor, had arranged his orchestra so that the strings were on one side of him and the "wind" on the other; but the performers were not sunk in a pit as at Bayreuth. This, we think, was a mistake. When the lights in the auditorium were turned down to the lowest point, the glare of those on the orchestral desks interposed a barrier between the drama and its spectators which, we feel sure, Herr Wagner himself would have tolerated only under the strongest protest. The sole barrier contemplated by him was a transparent veil of sound, rising up from the depths, and colouring all behind with its own rich hues. Following our national custom, the orchestra played "God save the Queen" before the curtain rose, and then, amid a hush of expectation, the long E flat which heralds the Rhinegold sounded forth.

The Nibelung's Ring, as everybody knows, is a play in four grand divisions, corresponding to the "acts" of an ordinary drama, each section, save one, being subdivided, and each, without exception, taking up an entire evening. Of the four, the Rhinegold comes first, and is strictly a prelude, dealing with events antecedent to the opening of the "argument" proper, and doing so in one long act, the curtain not falling till the time has come to send the audience home. Moreover, it has a simple, brief tale to tell, yet one that should be clearly understood on account of the light it throws upon all that follows. Rhinegold presents us with a key to the drama as a whole, and gives the "why" of much that would otherwise be incomprehensible. In the body of the play, the gods of Walhalla and the Nibelungs, or dwellers in the nether world, are scheming and fighting for the supremacy conferred by a ring, to the possession of which a curse is attached. The Rhinegold reveals how the antagonism first arose, in what motives it originated, and in what manner the bauble became an evil talisman, working the ruin of its possessor. Let us, then, follow with some attention the course of this important exordium.

The curtain, rising, shows the depths of the Rhine. It is twilight, but we can discern three of the daughters of the river as they swim about and discourse rather flippantly concerning the duty imposed on them of guarding a certain treasure. There is, it appears, a profound philosophical reason for opening the play in the water. Mythology teaches that from water proceeds all existence, "and, therefore," says Herr von Wolzogen in his guide-book, "it naturally follows all dismembering, all individual breaking up of primeval unity according to the law of appearance, and at the same time all demands made by one individual atom upon another, and all guilt." We have not the slightest idea what this means; but that should be no bar to our giving others the chance of comprehending it. While pondering upon the breaking up of primeval unity, according to the law of appearance, more substantial food for thought presents itself in the person of Alberich, a misshapen Nibelung, who crawls from the depths below the river, sees the maidens, and lusts after them. Thus early Wagner introduces an element with which, artistically, he has had great concern. Alberich pursues one and another of the Rhine daughters, who first coax and then evade him, till the Nibelung loses his temper, and calls them a "giggling, gliding, gang of unmannerly maidens," whereto they respond, "Wallala! Lalaleila! Lalei," whatever that may mean. Perhaps the incomprehensibleness of the language angers Alberich still more; at any rate, he is ungentlemanly enough to shake his fist at the girls, when a ray of sunlight reveals a mass of gold on a subaqueous peak of rock. The Nibelung, being the "representative of sensual longing after gain," feels no more a "blistering heat upheave his blood." He has his eye on the gold, and listens curiously while the chattering maidens tell that the god Wotan has made them guardians of the treasure, because whoso forges a ring out of the metal can control the world. This is too much for the "child of the mist." At a favourable moment he complies with the condition, grasps the gold, and disappears in the depths of the earth, leaving the Rhine daughters to scream "Help! help!" and "Woe! woe!" with unavailing energy. Crime the first—theft.

The scene changes to a mountainous district, with a towering castle in the background. Upon the existence of that castle hangs a tale. Some time before, Wotan ceased to find his life-delight in love, and, instigated by the subtle fire-god, Loge, turned his thoughts to the enlargement and conservation of material power. For this purpose he contracted with two handy giants, who might be described commercially as "Fasolt and Fafner Brothers," to build him a strong castle, the consideration being Freia, goddess of love, for whom Wotan had no further use. The firm did their work, and the new scene begins on the morning of the day when payment has to be made. Here we are first introduced to Wotan and his wife, Fricka, an energetic goddess of shrewish temper, and considerable force of language, which she at once exercises upon her husband, à propos to his conduct general and particular. She does not like his parting with "love and a woman's worth" for mere power, and tells him so. Then we get an insight into the character of this precious god. He never intended to pay the giants for their work. Crime the second—(constructive) fraud. Hereupon comes Freia herself in terror. The creditors are after her, but the miserable Wotan can do nothing, and Loge, who promised to get him out of the mess, is absent when Fasolt and Fafner appear with an irresistible argument: We have performed the work, now pay. In vain Wotan tries to "argue the matter;" nor when two other gods, Donner and Froh, hurry in, can they do any good. At last, the slippery Loge enters, and, after an unseemly squabble, states that in all the world he had not been able to find anything "that can weigh in the mind of a man for woman's wonder and worth." Upon this the gods "fall into surprise and confusion," which is not remarkable, seeing what a set they are. But Loge has more to say. He tells of Alberich and the golden treasure, and the giants listen. The Nibelung is an old enemy of theirs, now more to be dreaded than ever. What if they bargain to exchange Freia for the gold—which Wotan must obtain—and the might it brings? With this idea they approach the god; but Wotan has a thought of his own, namely, to get the masterful booty for himself. He would steal from the thief. So he denies the giants, who seize Freia, and march off with her incontinent. As the goddess of Love and Perpetual Youth disappears, the gods begin to look old, and feel so terribly alarmed that Wotan changes his mind, saying to Loge: "Let us be off! To Nibelheim now together! At hazards I'll have the gold." Both disappear down a cleft on their larcenous mission, and the scene changes to a subterranean cavern, the workshop of the Nibelungs. Alberich reigns here by the power of the ring, and characteristically abuses his own brother, Mime, who has been forging a "tarn-cap" able to render him who wears it invisible. Alberich seizes the prize, gives his unhappy relative a sound beating, and leaves him howling with pain. Mime is thus engaged when Wotan and Loge appear. The poor Nibelung is ready enough to explain the cause of his grief, and thus the gods acquire valuable information for their encounter with Alberich, who now enters, driving before him a crowd of his treasure-laden subjects, whipping them impartially as they hurry along. The gods have, of course, to explain their presence, and Wotan proffers a convenient lie, preparatory to a long conversation, in which Alberich declares the time at hand when with his might he will subdue all things. Clever Loge demands an exhibition of his power, and the Nibelung falls into the trap. Putting on the tarn-helm, he changes himself into a big snake. Yes; that is all very well, but can he assume the form of a smaller creature? In another moment Alberich appears as a toad, and his fate is sealed. Wotan puts his foot on the creature; Loge seizes the tarn-helm; Alberich returns to his proper shape; and, as quickly as words can tell it, is being hurried, bound hand and foot, to the upper air by the triumphant tricksters. Crime the third—theft, combined with aggravated assault.

Returning to the second scene, we find Wotan and Loge with their prisoner, who is now obliged to purchase his freedom, first with the treasure, which is brought up by the Nibelungs, and piled in heaps around; next, by the tarn-helm, and lastly by the precious ring. Needs must that the bauble go; but not before Alberich has attached to it a curse as elaborate as the "greater excommunication." Henceforth the ring will work woe to its possessor, though why the wish of a despoiled rogue should have such power is not clear. Now enter the giants with Freia, at whose approach the gods recover their youthful looks. Fafner and Fasolt are willing to give her up for as much treasure as, piled around, will hide her from sight. The heap soon grows; but, when all is done, the hair of the goddess remains visible. Hide it with the tarn-helm. Still there is a chink through which Fasolt can see her eye. Stop it with the ring. Wotan will not. He cleaves to his ill-gotten talisman, and remains stedfast in that resolve till Erda, the wise earth-goddess, partly emerges from a chasm with warning words: "A day of gloom dawns for the gods; be ruled, and wince from the ring." At length Wotan yields, and Freia rejoins her companions. Immediately Alberich's curse begins to work. The giants quarrel about the division of their wealth, and Fafner striking Fasolt dead (crime the fourth—murder), crams the entire booty into a sack, shoulders it, and marches away. Wotan sees this with a sinking heart, but Fricka invites him to enter the castle he had bought with "blameful pay," and Donner and Froh build a rainbow bridge across the river for his use. Along this shining road move the gods to the place which Wotan names Walhall, while as they do so the lament of the Rhine Daughters for their lost treasure rises out of the gulf below. The curtain then falls, and the prelude is over, leaving the circumstances under which the actual drama begins tolerably clear. We know that between Alberich and Wotan there must be war for the possession of the symbol of material power, and we suspect that the clumsy monster who has now got hold of it will be ground to pieces by the impact of such formidable antagonists.

We should insult the intelligence of the reader were pains taken here to characterise the story above sketched. Strictly speaking, we may not declare that it lacks human interest, because the gods of most nations are only shadows of men projected to a distance, and looming in exaggerated proportions. No doubt Wotan and his associates are a fair type of the people who bowed down to them. But what a company they form, and what an atmosphere we breathe when among them! The gods of classic mythology are bad enough, in all conscience; to them, however, attaches a certain dignity and nobleness wanting to the Scandinavian deities, who are low tricksters, capable, in civilized society, of affording much interesting occupation to the detective police. In vain does the art of Wagner, poet and musician, try to make us overlook this. His "far-removedness" counts for nothing; his attempt to reproduce the stately gravity and impressive repose of Greek tragedy utterly fails; and we entertain only contempt for the fabled personages who, with man's cunning but without man's excuse, try to get the better of each other by any and every means. It is true that keen eyes can discern, through the rank atmosphere of deceit and wickedness, outlines of a great lesson. But even a great lesson may be bought too dear. In speaking of the Rhinegold music we are confronted at once by the difficulty of knowing where to take it. The score contains thirty-five representative themes, out of which substantially it is made, and the real question is whether or no they fittingly stand for the characters and ideas behind them. Unfortunately there is little data to go upon. The motive of the "godly sword" commends itself to our perception by its martial character, and the motive of the "snake" by its low crawling. On the other hand, how can we judge the motive of the "tarn-cap's spell" or of the "magic golden apples?" The connection of such things with music must be purely arbitrary, and in every such case we are driven to regard the musical effect alone. Here lies the weakness of Wagner's elaborate system. The few who burn midnight oil on the Wagnerian altar, and master the form and significance of every theme, may find their interest in listening to the orchestra as a part of the dramatic expression, but the many will always hear with an ear for musical expression and be disappointed. In this work the music has something else to do than to heighten the feeling of the moment. It is busy with dramatic reflections, reminiscences, and suggestions, in the bondage of which the composer is so held that only at distant intervals does he get an opportunity of arousing emotion by his strains. Let us hasten to add that Wagner turns those opportunities to good account. Our admiration he commands throughout, as would a man in the street dancing a hornpipe in self-imposed fetters, and our sympathy he enjoys whenever his genius works with freedom. It would be easy to give instances, such as the salute of the Rhine daughters to the glistening gold, the passages wherein the solemnly beautiful Walhall theme predominates, and the music of Loge, as bright and subtle as himself. As to the rest, or much of it the listener for musical effect alone passes through a time of weariness, relieved only by orchestration which is a model of skill and resource. Here nothing hinders the master from asserting his full masterfulness, and the result, as we pointed out in 1876, is simply wonderful. The orchestra flashes and darkens, glows with this hue and with that, and combines with play of light and colour such richness of device that the hand of the censor takes up only the pen of a eulogist. Pity that so rich a genius is so largely wasted upon a system which must needs be barren!

We remarked, a while ago, that the perfect performance of Bayreuth was not to be looked for at Her Majesty's Theatre, and this night's doings justified a foreboding extremely easy to entertain. Who expected anything else? The resources of Bayreuth were those of all musical Germany, given without stint to the master who needed them. Those commanded by Mr Angelo Neumann are far more circumscribed. Yet let us not underrate them. The orchestra is numerous and efficient, if not extraordinary; the actors are, some of them excellent, all of them more or less qualified by training and experience, while the stage effects, though here and there somewhat marred, are of a satisfactory character. For the scenery, however, much cannot be said. It assuredly was not the scenery of Bayreuth, where Walhall towered in stately grandeur, instead of presenting at the back a mass of odd forms belonging to no recognizable order of architecture. Some of the leading characters were admirably represented, among them, first and best, Loge, by Herr Vogl, who played the part at Bayreuth. The vivacity and finesse of this actor belong to French rather than German art, while his singing is marked by qualities that peculiarly adapt it to Wagnerian music. Herr Vogl's success was great and well deserved. After him mention should be made of Herr Otto Schelper as Alberich. Herr Scaria as Wotan, Frau Reicher-Kindermann as Fricka, Fräulein Schreiber as Freia, and the representatives of the three Rhine Daughters. In all these, and, according to degree, in others unnecessary to mention, the true spirit of the drama appeared, while their familiarity with the declamation excited the wonder of amateurs who knew how few points there were in it to guide the memory. Herr Seidl conducted with much ability, and at the close, the audience expressed satisfaction, not a little of which he may be said to have provoked.—D. T.

FORM, OR DESIGN, IN VOCAL MUSIC.

Samuel Sebastian Wesley's anthem, "Blessed be the God and Father," is a clearer application, of the same principle of form to groups of movements; namely, to remain for a certain time in the main key, to modulate and to return, to modulate again, and again to return. The first movement is a simple, complete idea in E flat, comprising a first strain with half-close and a second with full close. The second movement modulates through its whole course, and ends with a half-close in the main key. The third is also a complete movement in the main key, with a middle section in the dominant. The fourth movement, a dignified recitative for the whole of the men's voices, is in constantly changing keys, ending, as did the second movement, with a half-close in E flat, which leads into the succeeding movement. The fifth, and last, is another complete movement in E flat with modulating section, with return to part of the first section and with coda.

Works of still larger development retain, in some cases, the title of anthem, such as the Chandos anthems of Handel's, with orchestral accompaniment, and S. S. Wesley's "O Lord, Thou art my God."

Handel's sixth Chandos anthem consists of eight movements, each self-complete in its own key and in the sense of the words allotted to it, and each of sufficient length and importance to be performed independently of the rest. At the same time, they are all connected not only by the sequence of the words, but by the relationship of the different keys in which they are written. The first, fifth, and last movements are in E flat, the second is in C minor, whose tonic chord is that on note VI of the key of E flat. The third movement is in G minor, III of E flat; the fourth, B flat, V of E flat. After the fifth movement, which is in E flat, comes the sixth, in G minor; the seventh, in B flat, and the last, in E flat. Therefore, the keys of the whole series follow the same principle of tonal form that we have traced in single movements and in chains of successive short movements; namely, that after the primary key has been made clear modulation is used, then a return to the primary key—modulation used again, and a return to the primary key closes the piece.

In this anthem, too, as in others, is the principle which we have before endeavoured to make evident. Tonal, or key, form is used in vocal music as a help to the form in which the ideas are laid out, and is also used in addition to it; and by it the music stands on its own basis by the side of, as well as on, the basis of the verbal sentiment, and is a true helpmate and not a burden to the sentiment. It is like the concrete which is poured into the cavity of a new foundation, which fills up the hollow and takes the form outlined by the foundation-walls and becomes as firm as the walls themselves, and stands by itself as well as by them and supporting them. Certain changes of voice, as from chorus to solo, from solo bass to solo tenor, or other varieties of that kind, refer rather to a kind of instrumentation, or use of the means by which the music should be exhibited, than to the form or design of the music itself; and they may be compared to the colouring of a picture, which is, to some extent, distinct from the drawing or outline of it. (A pill for the "advanced" school.—Dr Blimp.)

Besides the Italian cantata, such as Stradella's Nerone and Purcell's From Rosy Bowers, which have already been described, there is another form which bears the same name—the church cantata of North Germany. This is written on the words of some hymn or sacred poem; and, in point of musical form, is like the Chandos anthems lately described, being divided into distinct large movements—chorus, solo, duet, &c.—in kindred or connected keys. The time of a choral, or hymn, is always introduced, in some shape, in the course of the church cantata, either harmonized for chorus, or woven into the composition of one or other of the movements.

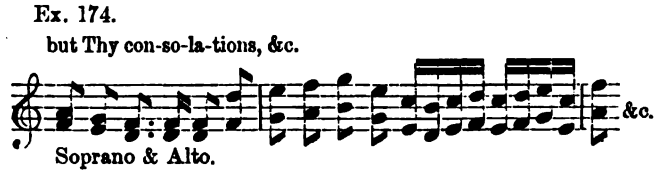
Bach wrote cantatas for every Sunday for four years; and one of these, My Spirit was in Heaviness, will be a fitting example.

Bach's cantata begins with a symphony or introduction in C minor, coming to a full close. The first vocal number is a chorus in C minor, with the words, "Lord, my God, my spirit was in heaviness and deep affliction; but, Lord, Thy consolations have my soul restored." This is in two divisions, according to the two divisions of the words. The first, after the simple announcement of the first words, "Lord, my God," is in close imitation of accent, though of differing intervals.

Ex. 173.

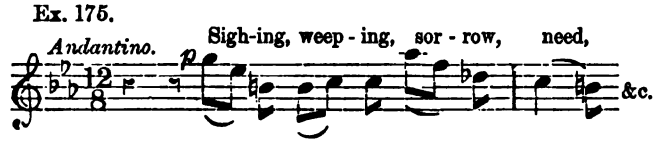
This is worked with the fugual alternation of tonic and dominant keys, in the four different voices, and then, through a course of modulation, back to a half-close in C minor, to lead on to the second division. This second division is also imitative and in C minor, but on a new subject.

Ex. 174.



The next movement, a solo, is also in C minor.

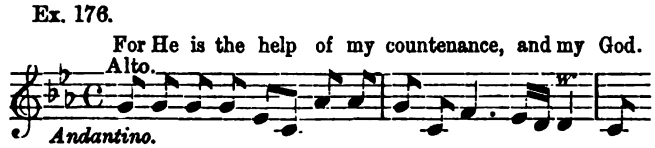
Ex. 175.



The plan of this is a miniature sonata without second part; but in the conduct of the recapitulation it resembles that of one of Mozart's pianoforte sonatas in C, which begins the recapitulation of the first subject in a new key, instead of C; and also the pianoforte sonata of Beethoven in F (Op. 10), which begins the recapitulation in D ("Form or Design in Music," p. 18). In this song the recapitulation of the first idea begins in G minor, going, by a re-composition of the idea, into C minor for the conclusion.

No. 4 is an accompanied recitative, which begins in C minor and goes rapidly through modulation to a half-close in F minor. This half-close leads into the next number, for the same voice, in F minor—a movement in the Scarlatti form—"Fast my bitter tears are flowing." No. 6, a chorus, begins with a sort of fantasia, a chain of distinct ideas both of words and music, and with much modulation. The first key, F minor, connects it with the previous number, and the half-close in C at the end connects it with the following and most important part of this number. This is a fugue given out first by the solo quartet and afterwards by the full chorus. The subject is always in C minor, the answer always in G minor.

Ex. 176.



A close on the major chord of C at the completion of the fugue brings the first part of the cantata to an end.

MUSIC IN NEW YORK.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Since my last letter, the operatic world has been interested chiefly in a discussion between Mr J. H. Mapleson and Mr H. E. Abbey, as to which of the two has engaged Adelina Patti for next season's opera in this city. Mr Abbey says that Patti promised him before sailing that she would return to him, and to no one else, while Mr Mapleson says that he has a contract with Signor Franchi engaging Mdme Patti to sing three times a week, from the 23rd of next October until the 1st of March, for which she is to receive 4,400 dollars (£880) a night. In consideration of offering Mdme Patti to his subscribers, Mr Mapleson has asked the directors of the Academy of Music, who give him the house in exchange for two hundred free seats, to pay next year the difference between the present Academy prices and those he expects to ask when he has Patti. The present usual price is four dollars a seat in the boxes. The Patti price will be eight dollars, so that he asks the stockholders to pay four dollars a night for their seats. This they have pretty generally concluded to do, and several of them have even gone so far as to aid Mr Mapleson in raising a fund of £8,000, which must be deposited as a guaranty. The general impression is that if Mdme Patti comes back at all she will sing for Mr Mapleson, as she confided to several professional friends here that she would not again undergo such a tour as the one with Mr Abbey for double the money. That undertaking, by the way, resulted in a loss of £2,400 to the persons who furnished the money. Patti herself is reported to have taken away with her £33,000, out of which she has to pay Nicolini and Franchi. Nevertheless, these monetary details must be taken cum grano. Few are inclined to believe that Mr Mapleson, or anyone else, expects to pay £880 a night. Upon leaving us, Mdme Patti expressed great sorrow at the parting, and great admiration for the Americans. She had always regarded the United States as one of her favourite native countries, and would gladly live and die here if she had not purchased an estate in Wales.

Mr Mapleson's regular season came to a close last week, and he is now giving a series of performances at popular prices—two dollars for the best seats. It is, unfortunately, true that Campanini has temporarily damaged his voice. During the tour through the Western States he sang too often, and came back thoroughly exhausted. Since then his best friends have been hoping that, with rest and care, he would recover. But they have, up till now, been disappointed. His voice—they say—seems to have lost carrying power and sweetness of quality; and a doubt prevails in many quarters as to whether the summer's rest will restore it to its normal condition. After some words with Mr Mapleson, and threatened lawsuits, Mdme Minnie Hauk leaves the company, and has undertaken a concert tour with that old favourite Brignoli, Tagliapietra the baritone, and Teresa Carreño, a Spanish pianist, well known to London. There are also rumours of an English opera company for next year, in which Mdme Hauk and Miss Kellogg will share the hard work. Altogether Mr Mapleson's season has been successful, and has returned a net profit of about £10,000. He expects to disband his company and return to England in two weeks.

Mr Abbey, who has a contract with Christine Nilsson for next winter, has also engaged Del Puente, and will sail for England on the 11th of May, to make up the company; so that whether Patti comes or not, we shall have, at least, two Italian opera "troops" during the winter.

BERLIN.—Mad. Mallinger has recently abandoned her project of studying with a view to playing in spoken drama. The sympathy manifested by the public on the occasion of her farewell appearance at the Royal Opera, has induced her to cherish the hope of continuing on the lyric stage. Competent judges have declared that her voice has merely suffered from overwork and unskilful treatment. Her special reason for attempting to restore it to its old efficiency is, that it has recently been much superior to what it was, a fact attributed by the lady to the training to which it has of late been subjected. Mad. Mallinger is now studying assiduously with a well-known singing-mistress. — The operatic season at Kroll's Theatre commenced on the 6th inst.

IV.

Cherubini was back in Paris by the beginning of March—that is to say, a few days after the performance of his Ifigenia in Turin. He lost no time, but immediately set about the composition of his Démophon, the poem of which Marmontel had given him eighteen months previously. He was evidently very anxious about it, and justly considered his first essay on the French stage as a highly important matter, for, with the exception of Démophon, he wrote nothing in the course of 1788; I say nothing, because his catalogue for this year mentions only an Italian air composed for the celebrated singer, Mdme Todi, who sang it perhaps at Court. The subject of Démophon, chosen by Marmontel, who borrowed it from Metastasio, placed Cherubini in a somewhat delicate position. A very talented musician named Vogel, who died in the flower of his age after successfully producing at the Opera a work entitled La Toison d'Or, left a Démophon, for which Desriaux had supplied the words, and which was accepted at this theatre. No one knew the score, but the overture, full of colour and superb in character, had been frequently executed at concerts, and had achieved a brilliant success. When the public heard that Cherubini was working at an opera on the same subject and bearing the same title, they thought—very wrongly—that he wished to enter on a sort of contest with Vogel's fame, to which an end had been so soon put. Still greater dissatisfaction was manifested at the steps he took when his score was finished, though they were very natural, to get it, through the influence of the Queen, brought out before the work of his posthumous competitor. These facts set the artistic world rather against him, and it was not, we are told, without a certain amount of prejudice that the public went to the first performance of his Démophon. This performance took place on the 5th September, 1788, and, if we were to be guided by the Mercure de France, we might think the work achieved a very great success. But it must be remembered that Marmontel, the author of the book, had for a long time been an assiduous member of the staff attached to the paper, which was consequently bound to treat him tenderly. It is only, therefore, with due caution, and with a disclaimer, as it were, of personal liability, that we must accept the praise lavished by the journal on the new opera, of which it first speaks in its number of the 13th December, as follows:—

"On Friday, the 5th inst., Démophon, a lyric tragedy in three acts, written by M. Marmontel, and set to music by M. Cherubini, was produced for the first time. . . . . It was very successful from beginning to end. . . . . In our next number we will go more into details concerning the very numerous beauties to be found in the poem and in the music. . . . . If we venture on certain criticisms with regard to the composer, far from being offered to discourage him in a career he has commenced so brilliantly, they will serve simply to lend additional weight to the praise he has so well deserved, and which we shall have great pleasure in bestowing on him."

In its following number (for the 20th December), the Mercure returns, at considerable length, to Démophon, and, while gently hinting that the public were at first rather reserved in their admiration, it nevertheless eulogises very highly the poet and the musician, without forgetting their interpreters, who, by the way, were no others than Mdme Saint-Huberty, Lays, Lainez, Rousseau, and Chardeni, besides Vestris in the ballet. This is how it expresses itself in its second notice:

"The performances of Démophon which followed the first one have been, as we foresaw, better understood and better liked. The petty pleasure of factiously opposing the work of a distinguished literary man has been succeeded by the less piquant but more flattering and purer pleasure of hearing an agreeable production. The prejudice, either too favourable or too unfavourable, with which people at first listened to the music, has disappeared. The score has now been judged by its true value, and the composer has reason to feel satisfied with the opinion thus formed, namely, that it was impossible for anyone so young and with such a slight knowledge of our stage to begin more brilliantly, and that the work proves he possesses everything requisite to do still better."

All this is slightly involved and strained. A little further on the writer states openly that the first impression was not altogether favourable to the musician:

"People had praised up M. Cherubini's talent very much before it was known in France. This mistake on the part of friendship is often more injurious than the abuse of hatred. Much being expected from the young composer, he was judged with great severity. His success, nevertheless, resisted so dangerous an ordeal, and that is saying enough for his praise generally."

Finally, after a very minute and very favourable analysis, the article concludes as follows with the reservations we are about to read on the general form and character of the work:

"We see, by the above host of quotations, that beauties abound in this opera. Perhaps there are too many of them (?), and this is, probably, the gravest defect of which we can accuse the author. By being too anxious about the dramatic effect, and by employing too freely the means for its production, he ends by weakening it. This defect, which, after all, is a proof of merit, is common to every young composer possessing genius, and experience alone can guarantee him from it. M. Cherubini's style is clear, because formed in a good school, and this quality is all the more remarkable in him, seeing that he may, perhaps, be charged with using the instruments too much. Again it is experience which will teach him that everything not absolutely necessary in the orchestra is detrimental and should be suppressed. We even go so far as to think that this defect is not a part of his particular manner, but that, when resolving to work for us, he was bound to study the works which succeed best in France; now, in this study, it is very important to make this distinction, that it is not on account of such a system that these works have succeeded, but that they have done so despite the system. M. Cherubini, however, presents himself in a fashion which causes us to presume that his second work will leave nothing to be desired."

To sum up, we do not quite know, after all the above, what to think of the attitude of the public, and the Mercure, visibly embarrassed, ostensibly registers a success, while at the same time it appears to put forward extenuating circumstances, the enumeration of which sometimes accompanies the record of a failure. In truth, Démophon was not a success, and the proof is that it could not achieve more than eight performances. At the expiration of two months the ninth was promised for the 6th February, 1789, and the Journal de Paris, in its numbers for the 4th and 5th of the month, thus announced it in its theatrical advertisements, but no ninth performance ever took place.*

It is interesting to know the opinion of one of Cherubini's most ardent and most sincere admirers—of one who has studied him more and better than most people—on Démophon. The following is the judgment pronounced by Fétis, when emphasizing the contrast observable between the young composer's style and inspiration in his first French score and the style and inspiration of that which he had just written in Turin:—

On the 2nd September, 1788, Cherubini's Démophon was performed at the Opera. It produced little effect and was coldly received by the public. The score furnishes a curious subject of historical study, if compared with Ifigenia which Cherubini wrote in Turin at the beginning of the same year. In the latter score, melody abounds, and, among several numbers full of charm, we remark a trio of the greatest beauty. Démophon, on the contrary, offers us only aridity in the cantilenas, vague motives, numerous defects in the rhythm and symmetry of the phrases, and, what is worse than all, languishing monotony in the general colour of the work. Even the harmony has nothing distinguished about it, and it is difficult to recognize in this feeble production the hand of a man who soon afterwards justly caused himself to be considered a great master. Whence could arise the embarrassment which thus oppressed his genius? It was evidently produced by the exigences of the French stage, previously unknown to him, and which he had not time to study, as well as by those of a not very musical language which did not offer the well marked rhythms of his native tongue, so favourable to the contexture of the melody. The constraint and anxiety caused by such difficulties are everywhere apparent in Démophon; now, talent exercised under unfavourable conditions can produce nothing but what is mediocre. From time to time we come across the beginning of a happy melody, as, for instance, in the air, "Faut-il enfin que je me déclare," and again in "Au plaisir de voir tant de charmes," but Marmontel's pretended and detestable lyric verses come in and dissipate the melodic perfume which seems about to be exhaled; poor Cherubini did not know what to do with these verses of all sizes, which sometimes compelled him to make his phrase five bars and sometimes allowed him only two, or forced him to augment the value of the musical tempi so as to make two bars out of one. The composition of this opera must have been one long torture for him.†

TO MARIE ROZE.

Oh, Marie! veil the radiant eyes
That melt with inner light,
Conceal the brow that o'er them lies,
The bosom warm and bright,

The dainty chin where dimples play
At merry hide and seek,
The mouth with careless laughter gay,
And either perfect cheek.

For we, enchanted by thy grace,
And lost in worshipping
The magic of thy form and face,
Forget to hear thee sing.

Or, if we listen to the strain
That, like a bubbling brook,
O'erflows thy lips in music, then
We all forget to look!

In vain to try the double spell
By which thou would'st ensnare:
Alas! thou singest all too well,
Or else art all too fair!

For we who listen to thy voice
Forget thy face to view,
And we who in thy face rejoice
Forget to listen too.

H. W. LONGFELLOW.

[Aïda was presented in Boston last night at the Globe Theatre for the first time in English. Marie Roze, as Aïda, achieved a great success, and was most enthusiastically applauded throughout the opera, and called several times before the curtain. Henry W. Longfellow occupied a proscenium box. He handed Marie Roze a bunch of roses after the third act, and went on the stage to offer her his congratulations. The critics are unanimous in pronouncing Marie Roze's first appearance in English a decided success.—New York Times, Nov. 9, 1881.]

MEYERBEER AND "LE PROPHÈTE."—An interesting letter relating to Meyerbeer and his celebrated work was lately addressed to the Vossische Zeitung. The writer says that Meyerbeer for very many years entertained the notion of composing an opera with Moses as the chief character, but, not to enter into competition with his friend, Rossini, after the production of Mosé in Egitto, abandoned his project, and got Scribe to write him a libretto on a very subordinate personage, the fanatic John of Leyden. This explains the discrepancy between the libretto and music when we learn, for instance, that the battle-song of the Anabaptists at sunrise was originally a martial summons to the People of Israel; the Coronation March, a religious march for the "Chosen Nation" after their release from bondage and the completion of the Tabernacle in the desert; and the Coronation intended, not for John of Leyden, but for the great hero and law-giver of the Israelites.—Signale.

* At the seventh performance, on the 9th January, there was an accident, thus described in the Journal de Paris of the 18th:—"There happened last Friday at the Opera an accident which might have deprived the public of a talented and very popular artist. During the last ballet in Démophon a trap gave way under M. Vestris while he was dancing. He disappeared entirely from the eyes of the spectators, whose alarm did not cease till he reappeared, carried by his comrades. He fell seven and a half feet, when he was stopped by a plank at that distance beneath the stage. He was not wounded, having only a slight contusion on one side. The shock he received rendered it necessary to bleed him, but he will, it is hoped, soon reappear."

† Biographie universelle des Musiciens. With regard to the poem of Démophon, Fétis commits a singular error in stating that Marmontel first entrusted it to Vogel and then took it from him to give it to Cherubini. Vogel had nothing to do with Marmontel in this matter. As I have already said, the book of Vogel's Démophon, entirely different from that of Cherubini's, was the work of a writer named Desriaux.

DUPONT.—Omnem diem, feles et canes (ut aiunt) pluit.

AM I RIGHT?—No, "cert'nly" as the Colonel says. The overture to Alessandro nel Indie referred to by our correspondent is not Cherubini's, but Piccinni's.

F. G. R.—Mdlle Caroline Salla, the chosen heroine of Françoise de Rimini, is a Parisian born. She made her first London appearance at Her Majesty's Theatre, May 3rd, 1877, the part selected for her début being Amelia, in Verdi's Un Ballo in Maschera.

DILETTANTE.—Mierzwinsky played Faust at the second performance of Gounod's opera. Frapolli assumed the part on the first occasion in consequence of Mierzwinsky's temporary indisposition. We believe that Frapolli could undertake any known character at half an hour's notice, and, moreover, represent it like a genuine artist. A singer so versatile and ready is priceless in a great establishment like the Royal Italian Opera.

ARIBANES.—Perish the thought! Had Beethoven been living, how would he not have stormed—he the author of Fidelio, the "Ninth Symphony," poet-composer of all time—at the mere notion of the Wagnerian "stage-play" being an outcome of his own latest imaginings! Had Mendelssohn, whose early disappearance from among us, Herr Wagner, in his notorious pamphlet, Das Judenthum in der Musik, laments (!), still survived, the new theory would have been blown to the winds with a first production of the completed Lorlei—a myth, also, by the way.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

THE following letter of congratulation was sent to the Queen by the Directors of the above Institution on the occasion of the Royal marriage:—

TO THE QUEEN'S MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY.

MADAM,—May it please your Majesty to accept the congratulations of the Directors, Committee of Management, Professors and Students of this Royal and National Institution on the recent auspicious event that has introduced a new member into the family which heads the realm. Deeply it is lamented that the dawning of the new joy has been clouded by a bereavement; but the members of our body politic and corporate join with all other loyal subjects of your Majesty in the hope that the Nation's sympathy may assuage the present sorrow, and that great happiness may be in store for their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Albany.—I have the honour to be, Madam, your Majesty's most obedient servant,

TO MADAME MARIE MUCHANOFF NÉE COUNTESS NESSELRODE.*

MY DEAR MADAME,—A short time since, in a conversation in which you participated, you asked, in astonishment, the reason of the hostility which struck you as being so incomprehensible, and so evidently prompted by a spirit of depreciation, with which every one of my artistic products was received, especially by the daily press, not only of Germany, but also of France, and even of England. I have, now and then, met with a similar expression of surprise in the notice of some uninitiated novice on the press, to the effect that the writer supposed that there must be in my theories on art something exciting implacability, otherwise it was impossible to understand why I, more than any one else, should be thus, without intermission, unhesitatingly set down in the category of mere frivolous bunglers, and treated in accordance with the position in this manner assigned me.

The following pages, which, as an answer to your inquiry, I take the liberty of placing before you, will not only throw a light on the subject, but will also enable you to infer why I am compelled to furnish this explanation myself. As you, however, are not the only person amazed at the circumstances in question, I feel the necessity of giving the same answer at the same time to many others, and, therefore, of publishing it. I could not charge a friend with the task, as I do not know one in so independent and so secure a position that I could venture to draw down upon him the hostility to which I have been subjected, and against which I am so little capable of defending myself, that there is nothing left for me to do than distinctly to point out to my friends the motives of it.

But even I cannot do so without a heavy feeling about the heart; this does not proceed, however, from any dread of my enemies (for, as I have nothing to hope, I have nothing to fear, from them!); it proceeds from an anxious consideration for devoted and truly sympathetic friends whom fate has sent me from among those related by race to that national religious element of modern European society the undying hatred of which I have incurred by discussing its peculiarities, so difficult to repress, and so highly prejudicial to our civilization. Against this feeling I was fortified by the consciousness that these rare friends stand in the same position as myself, nay, that they have to suffer more acutely, and even more shamefully under the oppression to which all such as I have been subjected; for I cannot hope to render my statement perfectly intelligible unless I explain with the requisite clearness, the oppression, so paralyzing all free movement, exercised also, by influential Jewish society upon those allied to it by descent.

I now, therefore, beg to lay before you an article emanating from my pen, and published more than eighteen years ago.

JUDAISM IN MUSIC.

(1850.)

In the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, reference was made, not long since, to a "Hebraic taste in art;" this expression could not, and should not, fail to be attacked, and, also, defended. It appears to me a not unimportant undertaking to investigate at some length the subject here at issue, a subject hitherto touched upon by criticism only indirectly, or in an outburst of a certain amount of irritation. I shall not have to say anything new, but merely to explain the unconscious feeling, manifested among the people as a profound repugnance for the Jewish element; I shall have to express plainly something really existing already, and shall not be attempting to animate artificially, by the power of fancy in any degree, something unreal. Criticism is acting contrary to its nature, when, either attacking or defending, it has any other object.

Since it is now our purpose to explain exclusively with regard to art, especially music, the popular repugnance felt even in our days against everything Jewish, we shall of course pass over in complete silence the reasons of this phenomenon in the domain of religion and of politics. In religion the Jews have long ceased to be enemies worthy of our hatred—thanks to all those who, within the pale of the Christian religion itself, have drawn down upon themselves the hatred of the people! In pure politics, we have never been involved in actual conflict with the Jews; we even permitted them to found a kingdom of Jerusalem, and ought rather to lament that M. de Rothschild was too clever to make himself King of the Jews, instead, as we all know, of remaining the "Jew of Kings." But the case is altered when politics become a social question; viewed in this light, the isolated position of the Jews appealed to our humane feeling of justice ever since the impulse for social freedom became clearer in our bosoms. When battling for the emancipation of the Jews we were, however, the champions of an abstract principle, rather than of a concrete instance; just as all our liberalism was a not very clear-sighted play of mind, seeing that we exerted ourselves for the freedom of the people without knowing them, nay, with a feeling of repugnance for absolute contact with them, our zeal for bestowing equal rights on the Jews sprang from the impulse of a general thought much more than from real sympathy; for, whatever we said and wrote in favour of Jewish emancipation, whenever we came into absolute, actual contact with Jews, we experienced an involuntary repugnance for them.

We have now come to the point that brings us nearer the object we have in view: we have to explain the involuntarily repulsive element existing in the individuality and being of the Jews, for the purpose of justifying our instinctive repugnance, which we plainly feel is stronger and more overpowering than our zeal, the fruit of a settled determination to free ourselves from that repugnance. But we still are only deceiving ourselves purposely in this respect, when we believe that we ought to consider it prohibited and immoral to manifest openly an antipathy for the Jewish element. Only very recently did we seem to arrive at the conclusion that it was more sensible to free ourselves from the restraint of this self-delusion, and, on the other hand, to consider quite soberly the objects of our forced sympathy and account for our antipathy towards them—an antipathy existing despite all our delusions about liberalism. We then perceived to our amazement that, while we were battling for the cause of liberalism, floating in the air and fighting with clouds, the beautiful ground of absolute palpable reality had found someone to appropriate it—someone who was probably highly amused with our aërial capers, but considered us far too stupid to recompense us by voluntarily giving up the solid ground usurped. Quite unobserved by anybody the creditor of kings has become the king of the Faithful,* and we can merely regard the prayer of this king for emancipation as uncommonly naïve, since it is we rather who have placed ourselves under the necessity of fighting for emancipation from the Jews. According to the present state of things in this world, the Jew is really more than set free; he rules, and will rule as long as money continues the power before which all we say and do loses its force. That the historical wretchedness of the Jews and the marauding outrages of Christian German potentates caused this power to fall into the hands of the sons of Israel is a fact into which we need not enquire here. But that taste in art, also, at the present day, has been placed in the busy fingers of the Jews by the impossibility of further developing what is natural, necessary, and really beautiful, on the basis of the height to which art has now attained, without entirely shifting that basis, is, on the contrary, a fact of which we do require to investigate at some length the reasons. All that the serf paid the lords of the Roman world and of the Middle Ages in misery and suffering, the Jew of the present day turns into gold; who remarks on seeing those apparently innocent little bits of paper that they are stained with the blood of innumerable generations? What the heroes of art extorted from the Demon hostile to it during two thousand miserable years, with incredible exertions, using up energy and life, the Jew of the present day makes an object of traffic; who would fancy that the pretty little productions of art are smeared with the sacred sweat of genius struggling for two millennia?

WAGNER'S TETRALOGY IN ENGLISH.

All persons conversant with R. Wagner's "Stage-Festival-Play," Der Ring des Nibelungen (which includes Das Rheingold, Die Walküre, Siegfried, and Die Götterdämmerung), are aware of the immense difficulties which must be encountered by a writer undertaking to translate the work into another tongue. Nothing daunted by this fact, Mr Alfred Forman boldly resolved to make the experiment, the result being a masterly version, or rather marvellous counterpart, of the original. It is entitled The Nibelung's Ring, and is published by Messrs Schott & Co., No. 159, Regent Street. From some highly poetic lines of his own, printed with the "Stage-Festival-Play," we learn that Mr Forman's was a labour of love and we can well believe it. None save an enthusiast would give the time and pains indispensable for the accomplishment of such a task. Parenthetically, too, it may be remarked that even an enthusiast might not possess the undoubtedly exceptional powers which Mr Forman has shown. Herr R. Wagner has every reason for the gratitude he expresses in a letter addressed by him to that gentlemen. Besides rendering Wagner's lines by English lines which, in our opinion, are quite as good, Mr Forman has even adopted the alliterative system, patronized by Wagner, so that not alone in spirit but in form as well does Der Ring des Nibelungen stand revealed to the English reader. Leaving, of course, out of consideration the original works involved, it may justly be said that what Schlegel did for Shakspere, Mr Forman has done for Wagner. J. V. B.

* The German: "Gläubiger der Könige zum König der Gläubiger," contains a play upon words, which cannot be rendered in an English version. "Gläubiger" signifies a "believer" as well as a "creditor," and the quibble consists in the fact that, on its repetition, the word "Gläubiger" is taken to signify "believers," "the faithful," while, on the first occasion of its being employed, it signifies "creditor."—TRANSLATOR.

ENCORE JEANNE D'ARC!

Très beau concert, lundi soir, salle Erard, donné par Mme Caroline Montigny-Rémaury, en présence de l'élite de la société parisienne. Il est intéressant de suivre ce talent sans cesse en progrès, et d'entendre cette magistrale interprétation des maîtres les plus divers, rendue si nette et si intelligible par la vaillante et gracieuse artiste. La fantaisie de Liszt, le triomphe de la soirée, étourdissante de verve et de brio, a été jouée par Mme Montigny avec une autorité exceptionnelle et admirablement accompagnée par l'éminent chef d'orchestre, Charles Lamoureux. (Enfin!)

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—The first appearance of Mdme Albani brought, as rarely fails to happen, a crowded house and a genuine success. The success on this occasion was achieved in a character never previously represented by the gifted songstress before a London audience. Those who admire Mdme Albani for qualities that entitle her to special distinction might have calculated in advance on the manner in which she would portray the heroine of Dumas' romance and Verdi's still popular opera. That she would sing the music of La Traviata in perfection every amateur was persuaded beforehand. It lies easily within the compass of her voice; and the charm of that voice, to say nothing about the artistic use made of it by its possessor, is universally recognized. The plaintive soliloquy, "Ah forse è lui," a true test of vocal expression, with its animated "cabaletta," and "Sempre libera," as true a test of vocal fluency, were alike satisfactory, the one for its touching plaintiveness, the other for its brilliant execution. Both caused a display of enthusiasm too genuine for doubt. Mdme Albani's delineation of the character is just what might be expected from her engaging artistic idiosyncracy—never obtrusive, always earnest, graceful, and intelligent, impassioned where the situation requires it, and softening down what, but for such refined and delicate handling, might be (and has been) more or less uninviting. Signor Frapolli was an excellent Alfredo, and Signor Cotogni an elder Germont worthy all praise. The opera announced for this evening is Faust e Margherita, with Mdme Albani as the heroine. —Graphic

* * * * * * *

A few lines must suffice to record the first appearance of Mdlle Stahl and the repetition of Faust with the special feature of Mdme Albani's resumption of the character of Margherita. The lady first named achieved considerable success as Amneris in Verdi's Aïda, the character being an important and arduous one, rising sometimes to an equality with that of the heroine. Mdlle Stahl manifested much vocal skill and special dramatic power, together with the possession of a mezzo-soprano voice of good quality and compass. She produced a very favourable impression, especially in the important duets with Aïda and Radames, and in the final scene. We shall, doubtless, soon again have occasion to speak of this promising débutante. The cast of the opera included the effective performances of Mdme Fürsch-Madi as Aïda, Signor Frapolli as Radames, and Signor Pandolfini as Amonasro. Signor Bevignani conducted. The brilliancy, pathos, and sentiment with which Mdme Albani renders the music of Margherita and the high dramatic power which she infuses into the later scenes of the opera require no fresh eulogy. These qualities were again manifested in Saturday's performance of Faust, with the same special effect as heretofore. The cast included, as on a recent occasion, Signor Frapolli as Faust, M. Bouhy as Mefistofele, and Signor Cotogni as Valentino; the part of Siebel having been transferred (on this occasion) to Mdlle Guercia. M. Dupont conducted.—D. N.

CONCERTS.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—The last concert of the fiftieth season, and most probably the last that we are to expect, naturally drew a crowded audience to St James's Hall. We have already dwelt upon the causes that have inevitably brought about the too early collapse of so admirable an institution, and need not recur to them. Nor on such an occasion is it necessary to speak about the performance in detail. The oratorio was Solomon, with the additional accompaniments of Sir Michael Costa, who, to the general satisfaction, had so completely regained his health as to be able to conduct with all that energetic precision and thorough mastery of the score, which have so frequently ensured a perfect execution of Handel's magnificent choruses. It was well that the great chief who revived the declining fortunes of the Sacred Harmonic Society as far back as 1848, and has directed them, with rare intervals, ever since, should preside over the very last. Sir Michael on appearing in the orchestra was hailed with unanimous cheering, which was renewed with increased enthusiasm after the National Anthem (his own arrangement) at the end. The demonstration was as genuine as it was justly due. The performance was excellent throughout.—Graphic.

ALEXANDRA PALACE.—Unfavourable weather is always certain to make an appreciable difference in the attendances at this popular resort, no matter how varied and attractive the programme. But when Sol is nearing its solstice, and Muswell Hill is bathed in sunlight, the denizens of London are not slow to take advantage of the many amusements so liberally provided for them by the enterprising lessees, Messrs Jones and Barber. Wise in their generation, they are careful not to make music one of the side dishes of their feast; on the contrary, from post meridian till dewy eve, at frequent intervals, "music hath charms to soothe the gentle breast," [by your leave, Mr Editor, I make the above emendation as I have sometimes thought the poet must have been in a savage mood when he penned this line].* Passing, with honourable mention, the performances on the organ by Mr Arthur Dorey, on Saturday last, comprising selections from Auber, Handel, Verdi, Smart, &c., and the excellent efforts by the String Quartet under the direction of Herr Schuller, at half-past three we made our way to the concert-room, where a ballad concert was being given with the following artists:—Misses Mary Davies, Julie Albu, Jeanie Rosse, Messrs Edward Lloyd, J. F. Probert, and Thurley Beale. Of their efforts we have only space to note that Miss Mary Davies, in "The Miller and the Maid," Miss Julie Albu, in "Angels, ever bright and fair," and Miss Jeannie Rosse, in "St. Agnes Eve," won the suffrages of their audience. In response to a unanimous encore for his rendering of Balfe's "Then you'll remember me," Mr Edward Lloyd gave the same composer's "Come into the garden, Maud"; and Mr Thurley Beale, in "The Bugler," and "The Yoeman's Wedding," received hearty commendation. The other artists acquitted themselves most satisfactorily. A word of approval must be bestowed on the Alexandra Palace Choir for their rendering of the several part-songs set down for them, under their capable conductor, Mr D. Beardwell. Mr Albert Henning was heard to advantage in a solo for pianoforte entitled "Hungarian Dances," and "Zigeunertanz."—WETSTAR.

[* "Wetstar" is wrong, nevertheless.—Dr Bluge.]

ROYAL ALBERT HALL.—On Saturday evening last this noble building was well filled by an audience convened to "assist" at a grand operatic and miscellaneous concert, under the direction of Mr William Carter. The vocalists present were: Mdmes Christine Nilsson, Trebelli, Szilardka Dumtsa, and a young debutante, Miss Patti Winter (whose appearance at the Alexandra Palace Concert we favourably noticed last week), Mr Joseph Maas, Signors Foli, Ghilberti, and Mr James Ley. The concert opened with Weber's charming overture to Der Freyschutz. The Miscellaneous on this occasion was the garniture to the Operatic, inasmuch as the only pieces "understanded of the people" were "What the waves said" (Carter), (given with such captivating style by Mdme Trebelli that she had to repeat the last two stanzas in response to a loud re-call), and "The King's Minstrel" (Pinsuti), sung by Signor Ghilberti. The operatic selections comprised excerpts from Il Trovatore, Le Nozze di Figaro, Il Flauto Magico, Roberto Il Diavolo, and Mosè in Egitto, the artists doing their best with the pieces confided to their care. Part II., however, was the feature of the evening, consisting, as it did, of the Garden Scene from Faust, enacted in costume, with the following cast: Margherita, Mdme Christine Nilsson; Martha, Mdme Dumtsa; Siebel, Mdme Trebelli; Faust, Mr Joseph Maas; and Mephistofele, Signor Foli. Notwithstanding her recent sad bereavement, Mdme Nilsson was in full command of her extraordinary resources, and plus the abortive attempt at a garden, which deceived no one, a most excellent representation was the result. Amid marked tokens of regard Mdme Nilsson retired from the platform with several large bouquets of flowers. Mr Charles Oberthür gave his harp solo, "Meditation," and accompanied Miss Patti Winter in her rendering of "Roberto tu che adoro." We must not omit to mention Mr Carter's performance, on the pianoforte, of Mendelssohn's Concerto in G minor, ably supported by the orchestra, exhibiting, as it did, his command over the instrument, and his desire to give a faithful interpretation of the music. In this he had his reward. A capital concert was brought to a close with "The Soldier's Chorus," from Faust, given by the gentlemen of Mr Carter's choir. Messrs Carter and Bending were the conductors.—WETSTAR.

THE second of Mr Ganz's Orchestral Concerts took place at St. James's Hall on Saturday afternoon, May 6, when the programme included Schubert's Symphony in C major, and the overtures to Ruy Blas and Euryanthe. Miss A. B. Huntington made a favourable impression by the way she rendered Rossini's "Non più mesta" and Lieder by Hartmann and Schubert. Herr Loewenberg, who made a favourable début last year in London, played Beethoven's pianoforte concerto in C minor, and confirmed the good opinion of his talents expressed on former occasions. Mr Ganz conducted.

MR CHARLES HALLÉ commenced a series of "Chamber-music Concerts" on Wednesday evening at the Grosvenor Gallery, which was fully and fashionably attended. Mr Hallé, with his coadjutors—Mdme Norman-Néruda, Herren Straus, and Franz Néruda—played two quartets for pianoforte and strings (Dvorák's in D, Op. 23; and Schumann's in E flat, Op. 47). Mr Hallé also played two Rhapsodies by Brahms for pianoforte alone, and Mdme Néruda Handel's Violin Sonata in D major, with pianoforte accompaniment by Mr Hallé. The performance of each composition gave perfect satisfaction.

MR GEORGE GEAR, the talented young English artist, gave his sixth annual concert on Tuesday, May 2nd, at St George's Hall, under distinguished patronage, before a large and appreciative audience. A well-selected programme included four new compositions by Mr George Gear (three vocal, and one instrumental), entitled, "Medea in Corinto," a scena (sung by Miss Anna Williams), which drew forth well-merited applause, due both to singer and composer; "Sweet Visions," a charming song, rendered with deep pathos by Mdme Patey, and deservedly encored—words and music being far above average compositions of its class; a Serenade, "In the peaceful Night," agreeably sung by Mr Percy Blandford; and a Sonata (No. 2), in C minor, for pianoforte alone, admirably played by the composer, obtaining for him a genuine re-call. Mr Gear's Sonata is in the "classical form," consisting of allegro, andante con variazioni, scherzo, and rondo-finale. It is a graceful composition, each movement written to display the executive as well as the expressive qualities of the artist. Mr Gear's performance of his own work, we need hardly remark, did not fail to command admiration. Little space is left to chronicle the remaining pieces in the programme; but a few words of encouragement must be awarded to Miss Kate Chaplin, a very young lady (violinist), who played with Mr Gear, Beethoven's Sonata in A minor, a "Scéne de Ballet," by De Beriot; and, with Miss Nellie Chaplin (pianist), a duet founded on Wagner's Tannhäuser. Mdme Adeline Paget, who gave a "Barcarolle," by Gomez, from his Salvator Rosa, possesses a fine, clear, and powerful voice, and sang the "Barcarolle" (in Italian) with great spirit. She afterwards took part with Mr Percy Blandford in Lucantoni's duet, "Il Convegno," and also sang Dessauer's bolero, "Le retour des promis," with genuine effect. Mr Charles Oberthür, as usual, delighted the audience by his skilful performance on the harp of Parish Alvars' brilliant fantasia on Oberon. There were other compositions of interest, among them being Rossini's beautiful duetto, "La Pesca" (Miss Anna Williams and Mdme Patey), and "A Winter Story," by Michael Watson, sung by Mdme Patey, the harmonium obbligato part being well played by Mr H. Parker. We close our remarks by observing that on each of his appearances Mr George Gear increases in favour with the musical public; and we doubt not that he will soon take a very high position in his profession.

PROVINCIAL.

READING.—The Berkshire Amateur Musical Society gave a concert of more than ordinary interest at the Town Hall on Thursday afternoon, May 4th. The performers, soloists and chorus, of the Society consist entirely of the ladies and gentlemen of the county. Finer voices and better choral singing are rarely heard, and the Society may be congratulated upon having secured the services of Mr John Francis Barnett as their conductor. The first part of the concert was occupied entirely by Mr Barnett's fine cantata, Paradise and the Peri, composed for, and given at the Birmingham Triennial Musical Festival, 1870. The performance at Reading was faultless. There was not a "hitch" from beginning to end. Solos and choruses were all rendered with due precision, and the entire work was received by a very large audience with the greatest enthusiasm. Mr J. F. Barnett was loudly "called" at the conclusion to receive the applause he so richly deserved. The second part of the concert was miscellaneous, and commenced with a pianoforte solo by Mr Barnett, who proved himself as fine a pianist as he is a composer and conductor. He played upon a magnificent "concert grand" pianoforte by Broadwood. Mr Charles Oberthür was heard to great advantage in one of his graceful solos for the harp, "Clouds and Sunshine." The vocal music—including a part-song, "From Oberon in Fairyland," by Stevens—was effectively rendered. The accompanists—Mr F. Davis, at the pianoforte, and Mr Giuseppe Dinelli, at the American organ—performed their duties admirably; and the concert, altogether, gave perfect satisfaction.

NORTHAMPTON.—The fifth Popular Concert of the series, being given under the patronage of the Mayor (W. J. Peirce, Esq.) by the Union Glee Club, and the Instrumental Quintet Society, took place in the Town Hall, on Thursday evening, April 27th, the principal singers being the Misses Cosford, Messrs. Warren, and T. Cosford, whose chief successes were in Professor Bergson's effective song, "The two Hearts" (Miss Cosford), Balfe's duet, "Trust her not" (the Misses Cosford), "She wandered down the Mountain Side" (Miss Cosford), all of which had to be repeated. The band played the overture to Sterndale Bennett's May Queen, and the adagio movement from Hummel's Military Septet. The members of the Union Glee Club gave Pinsuti's part songs, "The Watchword," and "Parting Kiss," G. W. Martin's glee, "Haste ye soft Gales," and Mendelssohn's "Hunting Song." Haydn's "Farewell" symphony concluded an excellent programme.

LISZT'S "DANTE" SYMPHONY.

"Audi alteram partem."

The symphony which Liszt has written in illustration of Dante's Divina Commedia was played for the first time in England at Mr Ganz's orchestral concert on Saturday afternoon, the 22nd ult. The performance, although not absolutely perfect in detail, especially as far as the choral finale is concerned, was, upon the whole, satisfactory, and did credit to the orchestra no less than to the zeal and ability of the conductor to whom English amateurs are indebted for their acquaintance with so remarkable a work. That indebtedness would be increased by an early repetition of the symphony. So complicated is the structure of Liszt's conception that a perfect execution as well as the full appreciation of its significance is almost impossible at a first performance. Liszt's Divina Commedia symphony is the first of his two works which, except by their greater expansion, do not differ in substance or artistic form from his Symphonic Poems properly so called. Everything in this Symphony has more or less immediate reference to the poem which is its basis. Like the Commedia, Liszt's work is divided into three distinct portions or movements, the first and most important of which deals with the "Inferno." Without any preface the movement sets out with a sombre motive of a strongly rhythmical character on which Liszt has inscribed in the score the opening of the terrible motto which in Dante's poem bids all who enter the gate of hell to leave hope behind—

"Lasciate ogni speranza, voi ch'entrate."

The composer thus at once strikes the keynote of his music, which proceeds to depict, as far as music can depict such things, the scenes of terror which filled the mind of the great Florentine exile. To give in words an idea of Liszt's vivid conception or to attempt an analysis of his musical structure would be impossible, and we need only say that here, as in all Liszt's works, a serious and even sublime poetic idea must be recognized, whatever may be thought of the artistic legitimacy of the musical devices by means of which that idea is carried out. It may be added that in the general colouring of his subject Liszt shows the influence of Berlioz, whose Fantastic Symphony is called to mind by more than one incident. But all is not unmitigated gloom in the musical "Inferno" of Liszt; it is lighted by a glimpse of love suggested by the Francesca da Rimini episode of the fifth canto. This episode is treated by Liszt with a delicacy of poetic feeling worthy of the highest praise. The tempo changes to a quasi andante, and we note some curious glissando passages for the harp, representing, no doubt, the whirlwind which carries along with it Francesca and Paolo, even as their passion had carried them to death. The lovers themselves may be easily recognized in the softly ascending chords of the two flutes accompanied by the harp passages already referred to and the muted violins. A recitative for bass clarinet which ensues may be identified with the words of Francesca, by which she prefaces the story of her guilt and misfortune—

"Nessun maggior dolore
Che ricordarsi del tempo felice
Nella miseria."

It is responded to by another soft phrase, this time for two clarinets, the dualism of instruments being sustained whenever the lovers, inseparable in death, are alluded to. Presently the harp passages are repeated to indicate the approach of the pair—and in due course a suave melody for the strings tells the tale of Francesca as plainly and as plaintively as she does herself in the lines of Dante's poem which are in everyone's memory. That a tragic motive of tenderest beauty has been admirably rendered by the musician it is impossible to deny. Liszt's poetic sensibility here, as throughout his works, must be admired by all unprejudiced hearers; the question only arises whether his creative power as a musician—in other words, his gift of spontaneous melody—is always rich enough to realize the idea so keenly felt by him. After the interlude of love, the tumult of the infernal regions is resumed with renewed vigour, the terrible "Lasciate ogni speranza" resounding again and again like the solemn voice of unalterable doom. In the second movement, the change of key from D minor to D major and the transition from the accents of rage and despair to those of sadness, still deep, but no longer hopeless or defiant, indicate that we have reached the "milder shades of purgatory." We must again, for reasons of space, refrain from a detailed analysis of this interesting piece, which includes an elaborate fugue and leads without break to the final section, in which a choir of heavenly voices sings the "Magnificat anima mea Dominum." In this beautiful piece Liszt gives utterance to his deeply devotional feelings, and at the same time shows his sympathy with the earlier Italian composers, whose style is alluded to throughout with the happiest effect. The air to which the "Magnificat" is intoned is, as Mr Barrett, well versed in such matters, states, founded on the old church melody known as the "First Gregorian tone." The Dante symphony evidently produced a deep impression on the numerous audience, and the merits of conductor and orchestra were acknowledged by loud applause.—Times.

"Quali colombe dal disio chiamate al dolce nido,"

AIX-LA-CHAPELLE.

(Correspondence.)

The following is the programme arranged for the Musical Festival of the Lower Rhine, to come off on the 28th, 29th, and 30th inst.: First day. Symphony in G minor, Mozart; Joshua, Handel. Second day. Pieces from the B minor Mass, Bach; Scenes from Armide, Gluck; Walpurgismacht, Mendelssohn; Ninth Symphony, Beethoven. Third day. Overture to Genoveva, Schumann; air from The Creation, Haydn (Mdlle Lilli Lehmann); First Pianoforte Concerto, Johannes Brahms (Herr von Bülow); air from Jessonda (Herr Mayer); "127th Psalm," Wüllner; Prelude and Isolde's "Liebestod," from Tristan und Isolde (Mdlle Lilli Lehmann); air from Oberon (Herr Riese); Variations on Themes from Beethoven (Herr von Bülow); air from Titus (Mdlle Rössler); and chorus from Handel's Joshua.

WAGNER has returned to Bayreuth. Henceforth, Parsifal will engross his exclusive attention.

ACCORDING to a report just issued, pecuniary affairs at the Imperial Opera, Vienna, have been satisfactory from 1881 up to the present time.—Marie Wilt, who is fulfilling a short engagement, opened with Il Trovatore.

As prognosticated some time ago, Richard Wagner is too exclusively occupied with the necessary arrangements for Parsifal to allow of his anticipated arrival during the performance of Der Ring des Nibelungen at Her Majesty's Theatre. The disappointment in many quarters will be great; and unless the much-talked-of journey to Greece, with its contemplated issue in an "opera-drama" derived from some tempting subject belonging to Grecian mythology, be carried out, there is reason to believe that Parsifal will be its composer's last great work. He has devoted all his time and thought to it since the memorable representations of the "Tetralogy" at Bayreuth (1876), when the poem was already completed and the music in a fair state of progress. This is not surprising; for if the score assorts congenially with the drama, Parsifal will doubtless be the crowning glory of its author.

TWO SIDES OF THE QUESTION.

(To the Editor of "The Times.")

SIR,—The case of "Wall v. Harris," referred to in the letter of "N. S. W.," has attracted very considerable attention.

It may be interesting to know that Mr Wall (who has an office at 8, Colebrooke Row, Islington) issues printed circulars headed "Copyright and Performing Right Protection Office. Established 1875. Secretary, Harry Wall, Esq., 8, Colebrooke Row, Islington."

Many cases have come to my knowledge in which clergymen and gentlemen residing in country villages have had the forty shillings' penalty demanded of them, and if they dared to dispute it have, like poor Mr Harris, been saddled with the costs of an action in a superior court.

Amateurs have no means of knowing what songs are or are not protected, and I have recently, on behalf of a victim, applied to the solicitor of the "Protection Office" for a list of the composers whose songs are not authorized to be sung. In reply, he writes me—"I am not at liberty to furnish you with the names of the supporters of this office, nor do I consider you warranted in asking for them." It is evident, therefore, that the method of "protection" adopted is simply to watch for innocent and unwary amateurs.

I would venture to suggest that such an abuse of the law of copyright may be prevented by a very short enactment to the following effect:—First, no penalty should be recoverable for performing a musical composition unless on the face of the published music there was a notice that the right of performance was reserved, with an address at which leave to perform might be applied for. Secondly, an enactment that the forty shillings' penalty, instead of being recoverable by action in a superior court, involving, as in the case of "Wall v. Harris," enormous costs, should be a sum not exceeding forty shillings, to be recoverable before and fixed by a magistrate, having regard to the circumstances of the case.

A MEMBER OF THE BACH CHOIR.

SIR,—With reference to the letter which appeared in The Times dated the 4th inst., I fear the writer's view is somewhat one-sided and contrary to the actual intention of the Legislature, which thought fit, solely and specially for the benefit, encouragement, and protection of authors and composers of "dramatic pieces" or "musical compositions" (and not for the general public), to pass certain Acts of Parliament, whereby such authors and composers (and their personal representatives or assigns) shall have as their own private property the sole liberty of publicly performing, or causing, or permitting the same to be so performed in the British dominions, for a certain limited term only (after which it shall become public property).

The printing and performing rights are very often vested in separate proprietors, who are frequently altogether uninterested in and even unknown to each other. The proprietor of the sole liberty of public performance only has no power to require the publisher to print a notice that such right is reserved, although, if practicable, the publication of such notice would be very desirable.

I think if the following suggestions were carried out, the public would have no just cause to complain of being unfairly treated:—Let it be enacted that no proprietor of performing right shall maintain any action for infringement thereof unless he has first caused an entry to be made in the registry-book at Stationers' Hall, or some proper place, wherein shall be expressed that he is the proprietor of such reserved right, together with such other particulars as are necessary for the guidance of the public. The price to be charged for such entry to be (say) 6d. or 1s., to include a receipted copy of such entry (and not, as at present, 5s. for the entry, and 5s. for a copy thereof). Then let a gazette be published weekly at 1d., containing a list, alphabetically arranged, of all such entries therein made—the fact of such gazette being so published to be publicly advertised, as widely as possible, in every newspaper in the kingdom, for, say, a month. There would surely then be no reason why such brain work should not be equally protected with hand or machine work, or other produce, and be as legally recognized as is other "property."

SGAMBATI TO FACCIO.

"Caro ed illustre maestro,

VIENNA.—A special performance was given at the Imperial Opera on the 27th ult., to celebrate the seventieth birthday of Friedrich von Flotow, who, though not in very good health, travelled a considerable distance to be present, and who was the object of "ovations" on the part of a densely crowded house. The work selected was Martha, which was first produced in this capital.

DRESDEN.—Berthold, organist at the Court Church and the Sophia Church, died, after a long illness, on the 28th ult. He was formerly master in the Friedrichstädtisches Seminary, Berlin. Thence he went in a similar capacity to the Imperial Russian Institution for Noble Young Ladies, and lastly succeeded Schneider in this city. Berthold produced numerous works, among them being his oratorio, Petrus, performed in Moscow, Leipsic, and (1880) Dresden.

HAMBURGH.—The members of the Cincinnati (U.S.) "Harngari Männerchor" will take part in the Festival of German Singers to be held in August. The directors of the Red Star Line have engaged to carry them here and back again for ninety dollars a head. They start on the 10th June.

GRANADA.—On the recent visit of the Infantas Doña Isabel and Doña Paz a concert was given at General Riquelme's palace. The programme included a String Quartet by Celestino Vila, chapel-master of the cathedral, and a Nocturne for Piano by Gervos, who was himself the executant. Señora de Carvajal was the vocalist.

MUSIC AT BOULOGNE-SUR-MER.

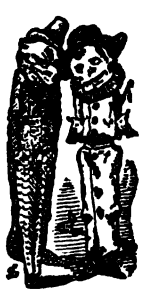
Last night the Philharmonic Society gave their third invitation concert in the Salle des Pompiers, a new building as much noted for its bad acoustic qualities as for its bad ventilation. The room was crowded, and the heat insufferable; but the audience managed to "sit out" a well-varied programme interpreted by MM. et Mesdames les Membres Amateurs, assisted by the pupils of Mdme Faye and the Société des Ocariens. I could not quite make out, at first, the name of the latter, and was much baffled, because I connected their name with "octogenarians," and they were all young men; and "octo" could not mean eight, as there were nine in number. But when they produced some instruments in the form of "Easter eggs," of various sizes and forms, and breathed into them what came out in the shape of "L'Echo de la Montagne" (Mazetti), and later on, in "Le Rossignol" (a very stout gentleman representing the nightingale), I became aware that they were accomplished "ocariens." A solo on the flute, executed with much precision by M. E. Aigre; a trio from Ambroise Thomas's Songe d'une nuit d'été; and Gounod's "Chœur des Sabéennes," by the members of the Society, brought the first part of the concert to a close. The second part commenced with "Les plaisirs d'amour" (Martini), a pretty sparkling chorus, the solo parts in which were well sung by two young ladies well known in the town. The well-known cavatina from Les Huguenots followed. A concerto in C minor, for the pianoforte (whose?), was splendidly performed by M. Brunet fils, supported by the orchestra; and the "Septuor de l'Africaine" ended the concert.

We must now say "au revoir" to the Philharmonic Society till November, and hope they have had as good a financial year as last. The Society ought to be encouraged, giving us, as it has, such good music during two winters.

M. Champagne closed the doors of the theatre, also, last night with a benefit for himself and termination of his directorship—Gentil Bernard being the principal attraction. Le Couçon, a pièce comique by MM. Raymond et Ad. Dumas (not fils, but petit fils), has occupied the boards lately. The plot is "peculiar," and better suited to a Parisian than to a London audience. Cadet-Roussel, a string of old French nursery rhymes, entitled a "folie-vaudeville," as well as many other old and new dramas, have been given during the season, on the success of which M. Champagne must be congratulated. X. T. R.

Boulogne-sur-Mer, May 3rd, 1882.



When writing some months ago upon the subject of these representations, we expressed an opinion that the time was not yet ripe for the production of Wagner's latest works in this country. Notwithstanding the remarkable readiness which the public have shown to support the present undertaking, we still adhere to that opinion. So great is the curiosity now aroused among all sections of amateurs, that there may be crowds at each of the four "cycles;" but this will not prove an acceptance of the theories that are embodied in the work itself. When the curiosity and excitement have cooled down, then will be the time for judging the genuine impression created by the form of "drama" hitherto called the Music of the Future. The complete success of Lohengrin in England is no criterion for the immediate fate of Der Ring des Nibelungen. The younger work has somewhat cleared the path, it is true, by accustoming us to the abolition of the aria, the prominent introduction of motives, and the raising of the orchestra to an importance not secondary to that of the vocalists. But Lohengrin is quite as much as the receptive faculties of the average English opera-goer can manage at his present stage of cultivation. How, then, is he to be expected to take to opera that deprives him not only of the aria, but of the duet, the ensemble, and the finale as well; that replaces sustained vocal melody by perpetual declamatory recitative; that constructs the whole musical fabric on a combination and reiteration of leit-motives; and makes the singer entirely subservient to the orchestra, and both inferior in importance to the progress of the stage action? We unreservedly declare our unwillingness to hail this new operatic form as the model upon which composers are to work in the future. Neither will we accept it if it is intended to oust from popular favour the many beautiful examples of the lyric art with which we have hitherto been thoroughly able to content ourselves. We say to Wagner, and those to whom we owe this unexpectedly early introduction of his big work:—"Thank you for an opportunity of hearing Der Ring des Nibelungen. It is a marvellous specimen of persevering industry, and represents the conscientious working out of an idea that may not be excellent. As a splendid tour de force we admire it, and are much obliged for such a chance of judging it as was, we thought, to be afforded for a long time to come only to a favoured few. You will not expect us to hear without questioning, or describe without criticising, and above all do not marvel if you go hence, and leave our old-fashioned Philistine notions just as they were when you came."—Sunday Times.

Der Ring des Nibelungen.—Last night (May 8th) Siegfried, the second division of the Trilogy proper, was given at Her Majesty's Theatre. In some respects it is by far the finest of the series. Much of the music is pleasing and comprehensible; some of it, in the Forest scene of the second act, is charming; but it is too often wearisome, and at times the sole desire of composer and instrumentalists seems to be to make as much noise as possible—an aim in which the greatest success is attained. The inferiority of the scenery was a disappointment to those who had witnessed the Bayreuth performance. Siegfried was admirably played by Herr Heinrich Vogl, and Brünnhilde by Mdme Therese Vogl, who did all that mortal singers could do for the final duet, some passages of which are altogether beyond mortal voice. Herr Schlosser's Mime was also an extremely skilful study. Pressure on our space obliges us to withhold a detailed notice.—Standard.

Venice.—The Teatro Malibran opened for the season at Easter. The first opera was La Juive; the second, Un Ballo in Maschera. The girl violinist, Teresa Tua, has appeared at the same theatre and met, as usual, with a cordial reception.

Brussels.—This capital, already possessing twelve theatres (including the Cirque Royal), will shortly see two more. A Flemish Theatre is to be erected in the Rue de Laeken, while an immense edifice, to be called the Palace of the Thousand and One Nights, will be raised on the site of the Hôtel de Suède, between the Rue de l'Evêque and the Boulevard Anspach.—Franz Liszt's oratorio, La Légende de Sainte Elisabeth, has been given under the direction of M. Joseph Mertens, at the Alhambra. The principal singers were Mdlle Kufferath and M. Blauwaert. Liszt, who occupied a prominent box, was loudly cheered. Between the first and second parts M. J. Becquet presented him with an address and a diploma, constituting him Honorary President of the Society of Music.

"Messrs Boosey & Co. have done good service not only to amateurs but to art, by including in their series of volumes of national melodies 'The Songs of Scandinavia' and 'The Songs of Eastern Europe.' The first-named contains eighty-three examples; and the second, a hundred. We need not insist upon the importance of collections like these, whatever the country they represent; but we must say that no musical library is complete without the songs of Scandinavia and Eastern Europe. The editor, Mr J. A. Kappey, has taken great pains to secure melodies of a genuinely representative character, and at a time when attention is becoming more and more directed to folk-tunes as a source of new thematic ideas, the volumes in question are of peculiar value. They have our most hearty commendation, the 'Songs of Eastern Europe' more especially, since the volume contains, besides examples of Liszt, Chopin, and other masters, a very valuable collection of volkslieder from the hitherto untouched wealth of the Austrian provinces."—Daily Telegraph.

"Messrs Boosey & Co. have published two additional volumes of their National Songs, which appear likely to be the most interesting of the series. We know little of the rich repertory of Scandinavian Songs, and Mr and Miss Kappey, the editors of these books, are to be thanked for introducing some of the best specimens to public notice. Five of the Russian songs are so old as to be traditional; and in the series are to be found a beautiful Cossack lullaby by one Bachmetieff, a gipsy song by Lvoff, and several songs by Warlamoff. These and the Polish songs (all of which are traditional) may be considered among the most interesting items of a small but acceptable collection. Two ancient Lithuanian songs, a couple of Finnish, and four ancient Norwegian melodies, will likewise be found in the book. The majority of the Swedish songs are by Lindblad, that prolific song writer, who died in 1864. Tradition says that the old melody of 'The Beggar Boy' was once sung in the days when she was a poor child by the distinguished artist now known as Mdmé Christine Nilsson. Included in the Danish songs is the traditional 'Dannebrog,' the music of which is attributed to one 'Bay.' It would be interesting to inquire the foundation for this statement, as the origin of the Danish National Anthem was generally understood to be unknown. The tradition of the 'Dannebrog Banner,' which, in 1719, fell down from heaven to bring victory to the Danish arms, is duly recorded in a footnote. Most of the Dutch songs given date back to the sixteenth century; and there are besides three songs by W. F. G. Nicolai, and one Flemish song. Altogether eighty-three of the national songs of northern Europe are included in this valuable and interesting book. In future editions a larger preface or more footnotes, giving further particulars of the old songs whose history is known, would be welcome. Equally interesting are the songs of Eastern Europe, recently issued by Messrs Boosey, and likewise edited by Mr and Miss Kappey. Among the thirty-four Austrian songs, the large majority are volkslieder, and they include Tyrolean, Styrian, and Polish songs, two of them by Chopin. These are followed by twenty-three characteristic specimens of Hungarian songs, giving a very fair idea of the peculiarities of Hungarian music, and comprising modern songs by Liszt, and some traditional songs of Bosnia, Moravia, and Dalmatia. The first of the Bohemian songs is the 'War-song of the Hussites,' once, it is believed, the national song of the country. A few specimens of Servian, Swiss, Greek, and even Turkish melodies. The last are very peculiar; and the peculiar intervals common to this and other Eastern music are claimed by some to have been handed down direct from the music of the ancient Hebrews."—Figaro.

We regard this work as one of the best that Miss Albrecht has yet done, displaying a rare amount of skill and talent; and this latest production will add greatly to the high reputation she has so deservedly gained. From a musical point of view it is charmingly spirited, and will doubtless receive due appreciation from all who really love first-class music. THE NIBELUNG'S RING.

II.—The Walkyrie. May 8.

It may be doubted whether quite so many persons witnessed the Walkyrie on Saturday night as attended the Rhinegold on Friday. In the case of those whose curiosity is languid, a little of the Nibelung's Ring goes a great way; and it is specially unfortunate for the work as a whole that the prelude interests less than any other division. But whatever Saturday's audience may have lost in numbers it gained in satisfaction. The music of the Walkyrie is often extremely beautiful; while the situations have a dramatic significance easily appreciable even by those who look for entertainment, and are indisposed to the severe mental exercise demanded by a system which almost makes the comprehension of lyric drama a penal process. Hence there was genuine applause at certain times on Saturday night, rejoicings, we are bound to add, resembling those of travellers in the African desert, who now and then come upon an oasis, and rest beneath the shade of spreading palms.

With the Walkyrie we enter upon the "argument" proper, calling to mind all the story of the fateful ring, as set forth in the prelude, and how that symbol and source of power passed into the keeping of Fafner, surviving member of the firm employed by Wotan to build his castle—Walhall. An indefinite period is supposed to elapse between the end of the Rhinegold and the beginning of the Walkyrie, during which interval Wotan has not been idle. The nature of his doings we learn by attention to much prosy talk during the opening act. Let us summarise it at once. In the first place the god surprises us. He actually has grace enough ostensibly to respect his bargain with the builders. He cannot exert the power of the gods to deprive Fafner of the booty which is his by treaty. But the exalted reprobate is quite equal to the task of doing it through another, who, being a free agent, will not compromise the Court of Walhall. To this end he has lived among men as Volsung, and (crime the fifth—adultery) had twins, a son and daughter, born to him. Enemies, of a clan to which a warrior named Hunding belonged, one day destroyed his home in his absence, took away the girl, Sieglinde, and gave her to Hunding to wife. At the wedding feast who should enter but Wotan, in disguise, carrying a miraculous sword, which he plunged to the hilt in the stem of an ash. A hero of his race, and only he, can withdraw the weapon. In Siegmund, his son, Wotan hopes for that hero; but the young man is ranging the forest with every hand against him. Meanwhile Wotan goes back to Fricka, his lawful wife, leaving matters to work themselves out. At some time or other the god has been busy in another direction. Erda's warning, "wince from the ring," oppresses him, and to know more he visits the goddess, plays the lover to her, begets eight daughters (crime the sixth—adultery), and learns the uncomfortable tidings that a son of him (Alberich) who had forsworn love shall bring the reign of the gods to an end. Wotan takes precautions, nevertheless. Bringing up his daughters as war-maidens (Walkyries), and giving each a horse, he sends them into the world to stir up strife, and to bring the souls of dead heroes to Walhall for its future defence. All this happens before the Walkyrie curtain rises.

Hunding's house-place, with the "world-ash" ascending through the roof, and the sword sticking in it. Night; a storm; emptiness; then a weary, weaponless man seeking shelter; then a kind hostess, Sieglinde. The pair are mysteriously attracted to each other, even before Hunding enters with spear and shield. The husband is at first kind, but curious and just a little suspicious. Who art thou, stranger? See, my wife would like to know. The guest answers, relating the adventure which had led him, hunted by enemies, to seek a refuge. An unlucky tale. Of those enemies Hunding was one, and he darkly replies, "Rest now, but in the morning look to thyself." Then he turns to his wife, "Go, prepare my night drink, and wait." Sieglinde obeys, first directing the guest's attention, with a meaning glance, to the sword-hilt, and Hunding soon follows her. Left alone, the stranger laments his defenceless state. Then his thoughts run on Sieglinde, and the love with which she had inspired him. Lo! Sieglinde is here to say "Guest; I have drugged my husband's drink; fly, but first take the mysterious glaive." They look into each other's faces and the stranger does not fly. He remains, to debauch the wife of the man whose roof shelters him, and the wife is nothing loth. Doors open revealing the beauties of a night in spring. "See," cries the guest, "how Spring, breaking down wintry barriers, woos his sister, Love?" The answer is "Thou art the Spring"—by implication, "I am thy sister." So, indeed, she is, and both knew it after Siegmund has plucked the sword—which he names Needful—from the tree. Does the discovery change the current of their passion, and fill its channel with the soft flow of fraternal affection? Not a bit. "Thou'st won thy sister, I tell thee, as well as the sword"—so Sieglinde, and to her Siegmund, "Bride and sister be thou to thy brother—so blest may the Volsungs abound." At this point Herr Wagner's stage directions are, "He draws her towards him with a frenzy of passion, she sinks on his breast with a cry." The curtain falls quickly. (Crime the seventh—incest.) It has been contended on behalf of Wagner that this famous scene is in its uncompromising frankness absolutely chaste, even as were Adam and Eve in Paradise when walking naked and not ashamed. We shall presently be told that every mind so debauched as to have lost all moral perception belongs to a respectable gentleman! Extremes, indeed, meet when utter hardihood of guilt touches innocence. But the matter is not for argument. Let us rather ask what is the good of an official guardian of stage morality when an offence shocking to the most shameless is enacted almost before our very eyes. Does the Lord Chamberlain sometimes nod and Mr. Pigot go to sleep? Or has the school of artistic carnality obtained a licence to hold a mirror up, not to our nature, but to that of the beasts? Be this as it may, we protest against the incest scene as a disgrace to the stage, and a scandal to those who sanction its representation before the wives and daughters of Englishmen. Upon its author we should only waste words. The writer of Tristan and Isolde, and of Parsifal, did not perpetrate the first act of the Walkyrie by accident. It may be said that Wagner has half redeemed the scene by surrounding it with a poetic and musical halo of exceeding beauty. We demur to the statement. Granted that he has covered a dunghill with flowers, there is, besides a consciousness that it remains a dunghill, resentment that things so pure and lovely are prostituted to such uses. "What fellowship hath light with darkness?" Coming out of the—we were about to say—moral atmosphere, no choice is allowed us but to acknowledge Wagner's musical success. In the—save the mark!—love scene, he deals with strong emotion, aptly expressed by themes of rare attraction. The predominance and continuance of the emotion enabled him, without breaking his own rules, to treat the subjects at length, and with something of symphonic fulness. Hence the charm exerted, and the refreshment of entering a region where emotional expression prevails instead of unsympathetic artifice. The treatment of the orchestra in this act is marvellously seductive. It almost wins the senses to the side of that which revolts the mind:

O, cunning enemy, that, to catch a saint,
With saints dost bait thy hook!

Wotan opens the second act. He knows Siegmund's danger, and bids Brünnhilde, his favourite Walkyrie, hasten to protect him in the fight with Hunding. Presumably, the maiden gladly obeys, for she goes after her horse, exclaiming, "Hoyatoho! Heiaha!" and likewise "Hahei!"—sounds suggestive of rollicking gladness. Brünnhilde, being a petted child, takes liberties with her wicked old parent, and, seeing Fricka coming, chaffs him about his wife's temper and tongue. We have great respect for Fricka here. She is actually on the side of decency as protectress of the marriage tie, the weakness of which no one should better know than the spouse of Wotan. The goddess, scandalized beyond measure at the doings of Siegmund and Sieglinde, has made up her mind that the man shall die. A long argument ensues, in the course of which Wotan shifts his ground several times, protesting that the pair have done no wrong, then that Siegmund is necessary to the gods, and so on. But Fricka is firm, and has her will. The miserable deity consents to blast his own hopes of a ring-robbing hero by destroying Sieg-

mund, and virtuous Fricka goes away triumphant. Now has Wotan to countermand the order given to Brünnhilde, and bid her slay the man she was to guard. Doing this he takes an opportunity to relate the whole family story of the Volsungs—first of a long series to be inflicted on the audience by this prosy personage. Brünnhilde pities him in his despair, and would turn him to his original purpose, but this cannot be, and the Walkyrie promises to obey. The stage being clear, Siegmund and his sister enter, flying from Hunding. Overcome with remorse and fatigue, the woman faints, and remains unconscious during the interview which now takes place between Brünnhilde and her brother. The whole of this scene is dramatically and musically impressive. Reluctant and sorrowful, the Walkyrie bids Siegmund prepare for death, telling him of the glories of Walhall, where dwelleth Volsung, his father. Calmly the man asks, "Shall I in Walhall welcome a wife?" "No." "Then I follow thee not." Brünnhilde repeats the doom, and Siegmund pleads for the woman's sake. The Walkyrie will protect her and the child she will bear; the fiat cannot be changed. Then Siegmund draws "Needful." "Two lives here lie before; take them, 'Needful,' terrible steel!" The war-maiden interposes, her pity overmasters her, and she promises to guard Siegmund in the fight which Hunding's horn shows to be imminent. Reassured and joyful, Siegmund meets his foe, Brünnhilde covering him with her shield. But Wotan seems to have mistrusted his messenger. At the critical moment he appears; "Needful" is shattered upon his outstretched spear, and Hunding drives his weapon into Siegmund's heart (crime the eight—homicide). Then Wotan to the victor, with a contemptuous gesture, "Go and tell Fricka how she is obeyed." Hunding falls dead (crime the ninth—aggravated homicide), and Brünnhilde, picking up the pieces of "Needful," hurries away with Sieglinde. So ends the scene. The chief dramatic interest and musical attraction of this act lie between the entrance of the fugitives and the catastrophe. Once more the tender love music of the first act enchants us with its genuine emotionalism, while during the noble dialogue of Brünnhilde and Siegmund, the solemn Walhall motive, in union with others of equal though different significance, holds us under a spell. That the whole act should be considered a marvel of ingenious construction is true; but in the situations just named the heart is touched. We forget to worry ourselves about "motives." Under the influence of true music reflection ceases and sensation prevails. This is some return for the barrenness of the scene between Wotan and Fricka, and for the tediousness of the god's narration to Brünnhilde. The early stages of our progress through the act lead across a comparatively arid waste, but the road conducts to a garden of flowers, and "all's well that ends well."

The third act opens on the summit of a rocky mountain, where the Walkyrie maidens assemble, greeting each other with boisterous cries, as they successively arrive, bearing bodies of dead heroes across their saddle-bows. After a great deal of "Hoyatoho" and "Heiaha," inquiry is made for Brünnhilde, who presently comes storming along in haste, with, not a slain warrior, but a living woman. She appeals to her sisters for help. Angry Wotan is in pursuit, and she dreads his wrath. But what is the offence? Disobedience, the particulars of which are told by Brünnhilde, and heard by the rest with horror. No help from them. Not one will lend her horse for further flight. But they pity while they blame, and hide their erring sister from Wotan's sight as he strides in. Wotan is really angry with the genuine anger of a confirmed sinner towards the sins of others against himself. He, the contemptible old liar, thief, adulterer, and murderer—the mean trickster to whom honour is a sham or a joke—cannot endure disobedience, and Brünnhilde must suffer. The generous Walkyrie—who has told Sieglinde of her coming maternity, and hurried her, bearing the fragments of Needful, into a sheltering wood, where Fafner, changed to a dragon, watches the Nibelungen treasure—comes forward slowly to meet her fate. The rest of the Walkyries intercede, but the precious All-Father turns savagely upon them, and then to Brünnhilde, with words of doom: "From heavenly clans art thou excluded, banned, degraded from thy bless'd degree." More than this, she must lie asleep upon the rock till a man comes to wake her; him will she serve as a woman her lord. Again the Walkyries plead for pity, but Wotan orders them away. Now ensues a long dialogue. The culprit pleads that she had only carried out her father's secret wish, and the god reproaches her with yielding to sentiment at a time when he himself had to sacrifice his fondest hopes. Next, Brünnhilde urges the degradation of his own kin and order; and next, the fact that the Wolsung line will be continued in the unborn child of Siegmund and Sieglinde. But all is in vain. Seeing this, the warlike maiden begs one indulgence—let no coward wake and win her: "My helpless form hedge round with hindering horrors, that but by a free man, fearless of heart, here on the fell I may be found." At this the All-Father is touched, and gives his promise: "For one alone freeth the bride; one freer than I, the god." Then taking a last farewell, Wotan kisses her to sleep, lays her down, with helmet on head, and shield-covered; calls for a sheltering fire to burn around, and goes his way as the curtain falls. The action of this closing scene is slight, and its dramatic interest is in proportion. Interest of another kind, however, attends the pictures of the Walkyries with their abounding life and wild, romantic surroundings. True, the maidens scream a good deal, and have music to sing which is characteristic at the expense of our ears. Yet the fitness of the extraordinary "Walkyrie Ride" will not be disputed even by those who hold it, as music, in abomination. Passing from this through the stormy current of Wotan's wrath, in respect of which sympathy cannot even be effected, the pathos of the farewell scene is found hardly weakened by its enormous and needless length. Our contempt for the god disappears in sympathy for the noble and generous Walkyrie—the only character as yet presented who is worthy of it. Whenever feeling thus prevails, Wagner's system, it is curious to note, breaks completely down as a system claiming our intellectual perception. Face to face with argument and exposition, we may listen to the commenting language of the orchestra if we have taken the trouble to learn its vocabulary. But when emotion prevails—when love meets love, or despair contends against fate—thematic significance is swamped and drowned in the current of feeling. Who then cares that, "with her answer in the motive of flight, Sieglinde renders herself up to the brother," or that "the motive of Freia introduces Siegmund's enthusiastic words?" This consciously concerns us no more than in the flood of a great orator's eloquence, does the law of acoustics by the operation of which we hear. Not unfounded in truth, therefore, is the system of opera that reserves high musical art for use at moments of dramatic emotion, and employs them free from the bondage of such a method as that which fetters even the mighty genius of the Bayreuth master. Before that genius, as exemplified in the astonishing orchestration of the Walkyrie, we bow, but the form of its manifestation we must continue to regret.

It is quite out of our power to praise the performance unreservedly, because, in point of fact, it left much to desire. The stage was often inadequate to the demands of the play, as regards both scenery and management—a most serious fault in such a work; nor did the orchestra give entire satisfaction. The "Walkyrie Ride," for example, was marred by the weakness and inferior quality of the strings. If this be the orchestra of the Berlin Wagner Theatre, the establishment can hardly be congratulated. Exception must, however, be made in favour of the principal wind instruments, which are in thoroughly competent hands. As regards the principal artists, Mesdames Sachse-Hofmeister, Vogl, and Reicher-Kindermann, Messrs. Niemann, Wiegand and Scaria, it may be said that all were thoroughly cognizant of the spirit as well as of the letter of their task. Their declamation—singing it cannot strictly be called—was full of point and emphasis, as well as, under the circumstances, astonishingly correct. To Herr Niemann, Frau Vogl, and Frau Sachse-Hofmeister, who had not appeared before, the remark just made especially applies. More than this—as a better occasion will arise for detailed criticism—need not now be said, and there only remains to add an emphatic word frankly recognizing the manner in which Herr Siedl filled the responsible post of conductor.

THE RING OF THE NIBELUNGS.

(From the "Daily News.")

A greater effort has seldom been made by the human intellect and will than that of which the result has just been considered by the English public at Her Majesty's Theatre with attention amounting at times to veneration and enthusiasm. Whether or not Wagner's theory will succeed in gaining a firmer resting place for the musical drama, fast slipping from its hold on human sympathy, is not just now the point. We moderns are losing the enjoyment of illusion. The enjoyment of impersonation is a born gift, and that, happily, we shall never lose. The dramatic representation of human woes, joys, passions, and actions will never lose its interest for us while we remain the creatures that we are. But in the manner of portrayal in all the arts the pressure after truth is sensibly winning the race over pleasure in deception. Realism, we may call it, or a return upon nature or what we will, but it is the same spirit which informs research, which ardently inspires men of science, which leads artists to abandon merely visionary fancies, and which when it goes wrong, as being of humanity it is certain now and again to do, breaks out into the "fleshly school" of poetry and morbid novels. One of the first artistic bubbles to burst at the touch of the spear of natural truth would evidently appear to be the thing we have named Opera. Romeo and Juliet, speaking to each other as Shakspere makes them do, are a moving spectacle. But Romeo and Juliet screaming in numbers, expressing their anguish in beautiful tunes, raving over the footlights in competition with the orchestra, singing both at the same moment and as loud as they possibly can, no longer appear artistic in any other sense than the artificial. Yet, after spoken words, what medium is fitter for conveying human emotion than music? It can tell the tale of passion so well that poets have deemed language faint and weak before its spell. This is the incongruity, this the chasm between opera and natural truth which Wagner has with heroic vigour attempted to bridge. Wagner abandons the imbecility of making people communicate with each other in set airs, and of subordinating sense to melody to such an extent that it mattered little to the audience what nonsense was sung so long as the music was lovely and the voice well produced. He transfers the emotional utterance to the orchestra and makes his personages declaim their sentiments in noble recitative, while the "motive" of each is hinted by vivid recurrent phrases from the instruments. He disuses concerted singing, only introducing an occasional chorus under conditions which might possibly occur, such as the joyous jangling of the maidens at the opening of the third act of the Walkyrie, or a duet when the joint ecstasy of two individuals prompts common utterance, as in the first meeting of Siegfried and Brünnhilde. He uses no poetic rhyme, but employs alliteration's artful aid without stint. He prefers myth to historical subject, for the logical reason that extraordinary and supernatural beings are not to be judged by human standards of opinion, and may properly be supposed to conduct themselves in ways which would be inappropriate to ordinary men and women. This in itself is almost a concession of the disputed point whether musical drama can treat satisfactorily human history, at a time when myths are going out of fashion. It is certain that the interest in his great Trilogy from the purely human point of view is continually being checked and thwarted by the intercession of magical arts and extra-human deeds. Still we must feel, whether or not his road is the right one, that the great musician stalks in it with the steps of a giant. He builds up vast edifices of musical harmonies, pile upon pile, till the imagination aches at the effort to follow, only to be freshly charmed by soft and lovely phrases, breathings of divine beauty, which penetrate the soul and enchant the heart. Fervent believers in his music claim for Wagner a place where Dante, Beethoven, Michael Angelo, and Shakspere sit. It is a bold verdict, and one the world has not yet adopted. Time only can decide it.—W. P. J.

Brizzi's new opera, Maria di Vasco, does not appear to have been very successful at the Teatro Brunetti, Bologna.

PARSIFALIANA.

I.

On returning home from the performance of Götterdämmerung, at Her Majesty's Theatre, on Tuesday last, I found a copy of the pianoforte score of Parsifal awaiting my arrival, which, thanks to the promptitude of Messrs Schott & Co., was supplied to me within a few days of its publication in Germany. Excited and tired as I was, and though it was an hour past midnight, I could not resist the temptation, before going to bed, of at least glancing into it. Almost the first thing to meet my eye was the "Grail" motive, which stands thus:—

Imagine my astonishment on recognizing in it an old friend, which has done excellent service in Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony!

In his admirable notice of the "Reformation" Symphony, Dr George Grove, the erudite annotator of the Crystal Palace Concert programmes, has told us that this ecclesiastical cadence "is employed as an Amen in the Catholic Church service at Dresden and elsewhere, and is said to have caught Mendelssohn's attention, while he was meditating the composition of his Symphony, as an appropriate symbol of the ancient faith." That Wagner—whose turn of mind is so opposed to that of Mendelssohn's, though he has not shrunk from introducing Luther's chorale, "Ein' feste Burg," into his "Kaisermarsch," which both Mendelssohn and Meyerbeer (Arcades ambo) had made use of before him—should have incorporated this well-known phrase as a "leading-motive," and for an analagous purpose, into his latest music-drama, at first thought seems indeed surprising. But, on further consideration, it is perhaps to be accounted for on the supposition that this ecclesiastical cadence, which has come to be regarded as common property, is one which has customarily been used to accompany or immediately follow that point in the Mass at which the act of transubstantiation is believed to take place. If this be so, the reasonableness of Wagner's adopting it as representative of the Holy Grail is at once apparent.

Further enlightenment on this point is, however, desirable, as well as more accurate information than as yet has been forthcoming as to the original source of the ecclesiastical cadence adopted both by Mendelssohn and Wagner. In what particular Mass or Service is it to be found? C. A. B.

German Opera at Drury Lane.—The decorations and all the scenery and dresses arrived by steamer at the end of last week. These have been taken to the theatre of which Herr Franke had taken possession on Monday last. Everything on the stage has been pushed forward for the opening. Herr Director Pollini arrived in London on Thursday, May 11th. The solo artists and the chorus are expected by Saturday. The orchestral rehearsals, under Herr Hof. Capellmeister "Hans Richter," commenced last week with Tristan and Meistersinger, and have been continued daily since. The theatre has been entirely re-decorated for the German Opera by Mr Edward Bell under the direction of Mr C. J. Phipps, F.S.A., architect of the theatre.—(Communicated.)

(From "The Times.")

Mdme Adelina Patti has appeared before the public in many characters, and has been successful in all. She has made us laugh with Zerlina, and weep with Marguerite; she has been now thrilling, now amusing, and always charming, in the operatic triumphs of twenty years. This week she has played a new part, that of the defendant in a lawsuit; and it is hardly necessary to say that she has won her cause, and that the verdict was followed by cheers which neither judge nor ushers had the heart to suppress. The story of the case in which Mr Victor Emanuel Stevens attempted to extract some £3,000 from the popular singer is interesting in more ways than one. Like most lawsuits, it throws much light on certain recesses of human nature; and it throws still more upon the life of a prima donna, the whims and fancies that she would satisfy, the sharks and parasites by whom she is surrounded. Craig-y-nos Castle, in South Wales, is Madame Patti's latest and most costly toy. The very name has a ring of Arthurian legend about it; it sounds excessively romantic, and in modern times romance is usually expensive. Mdme Patti, or Signor Nicolini, or both of them, seems to have wished to turn Craig-y-nos into a picture as bright and lovely as one of those scenes of Mr Beverly's before which they have won so many of their successes. But they employed native talent to work the transformation; and the native talent of South Wales has too much self-respect not to endeavour to make the very most out of the foreigner whenever it gets a chance. Mdme Patti soon began to repent of having pitched her tent at Craig-y-nos. She even, according to the plaintiff's evidence, came to use very strong language about the gardeners and gasfitters, the decorators, and agents who were preying upon her, and longed to be delivered from "those vile people." One, Barron, a landscape gardener, sent in a little bill for £5,430 for what he called "reclaiming the surrounding moorlands;" and, while making his profit on the trees and shrubs supplied, modestly charged a fee of three guineas a day for 272 days for his personal supervision. Mdme Patti's friends stood firm, and insisted on reducing this account by more than £2,000. Another charge was that of the builders, Messrs Rees, which has been the subject of a previous action, and which was reduced by some £2,500. There is a story of a small Welsh tradesman, as good-natured and as shifty as many of his countrymen, who, on being convicted of sending in a bill twice, smiled sweetly upon his intended victim, and said, "Ah, yes, indeed, Sir! the Welsh are full of mean vices." It was an unflattering piece of self-portraiture; but it must be owned that it applies to some of the tradesmen into whose hands Mdme Patti fell.

But the prima donna did not only require to be saved from her tradesman; she had to be saved from one at least of her friends. This was the plaintiff in the present action, a Belgian, whose real name is Stevens, but who commonly passes under his baptismal name as M. Emanuel. This individual appears to have been the London agent for some French olive-oil merchants and the manufacturer of a "progressive hair-dye." In the year 1879 he seems to have made the acquaintance of Mdme Patti and Signor Nicolini, then freshly smarting from the misdeeds of the Swansea tradesmen. Their talk, or rather the lady's talk, was often of these matters; and she would appear to have taken all the world into her confidence and appealed for advice and help to all comers. Mr Victor Emanuel saw his opportunity. To rescue an innocent victim would be nobler than selling hair dye; to be a friend in need to the most popular singer in the world would be more profitable than essential oil. It mattered not that Mdme Patti had already very efficient friends looking after her interests; notably Captain Gye, who in his battles with Messrs Barron, Legg, and the rest, seems to have combined the shrewdness of the man of business with the courage of the British sailor. M. Emanuel, early in the day, discovered that his new friend was not a woman of business; of a lady who spends £1,964 in chandeliers and gas fittings, and who keeps no accounts, so much may safely be said. She talked freely of her affairs; she asked him to help her in getting clear. Who would swear that in a moment of expansive confidence she had not offered him any terms, even to the half of what he might save her, if he would settle these exorbitant demands? Moreover, Mdme Patti put herself to a certain extent in his power by insisting that the affair must be kept secret from Signor Nicolini, and by allowing some kind of clandestine correspondence. The natural result followed. M. Emanuel busied himself with Mdme Patti's affairs, stayed at Craig-y-nos, fished the stream (which he found to be much poached, as all Welsh rivers are), saw the tradesmen, took care to be with Captain Gye and the other negotiators when business was in hand, and then when the overcharges had been reduced, sent in his bill for the half of the amount saved. He did not remember that he had unluckily written to Signor Nicolini, "Mon ami, tout cela je fait"—Mr Emanuel's French is not Parisian—"pour vous et votre dame en ami et sans intérêt aucun." He demanded, when these friendly services had all been rendered, a fee of £3,000. The jury were impatient, and would hardly wait to hear the speeches of counsel and the summing up. They wished to end the case after Mdme Patti's and Captain Gye's evidence; and no wonder. They thought that Mr Emanuel had been amply paid by the hospitality that he had received, by the watch and medallion that his hostess had given him, and the "small paintings of mine," as Mdme Patti said, "which I think have some little value." He must consider himself lucky indeed to get the £50 that the defendant paid into court to cover possible outgoings, such as the railway journeys that his pretended friendship may have induced him to take. An immediate verdict for the defendant, as the defendant's counsel put it, "relegated Mr Stevens to the sphere of essential oils and progressive hairdyes, where he may endeavour to gain an honest livelihood."

From that decent obscurity it is not necessary that Mr Emanuel Stevens should again emerge. It is only natural, however, that the mind should dwell for a moment on the curious picture of an artistic interior which this case presents. Money lightly got is lightly spent; a singer that can earn a guinea a bar is not likely to be the most prudent of housewives. It is said that Mdme Patti and Signor Nicolini are to have £800 a night for their next American tour; and though the figure is probably imaginary, that it should be stated and generally believed shows the kind of incomes which these "stars" are in the habit of receiving now-a-days. What need for economy and daybooks and profit and loss accounts when one has in one's throat so inexhaustible a treasury? Even the famous chandeliers can be paid for in a couple of nights or so; a fortnight will suffice to "reclaim the moorlands." The modern Orpheus makes the trees dance to his song, out of the gardens of Mr Barron and on to the slopes of Craig-y-nos. It is only bitter experience that shows that the very largest cheque that an impressario can draw will not last for ever, and that however quickly one may gain money it is possible to spend it more quickly still. Probably Mdme Patti has been for years the victim of one person or another—of those who wanted to sell to her and those who professed a disinterested desire to save her from being cheated. The bills of the Swansea tradesmen and of the chivalrous Belgian are very likely only the last straw. She has no difficulty in protecting herself, though the worry of the preliminary negotiations and the annoyance of a lawsuit with a being of that order must have been very wearisome. Probably her success will for a time keep off the wolves and the false watch-dogs; it will hardly change her own way of managing her affairs. The artistic habit of mind is not economical. It is to be hoped, however, that for the future Mdme Patti will beware of Welsh castles, of Belgian commission-agents, and of officious friends.

MDME ADELINA PATTI.

(To the Editor of the "Times.")

SIR,—In your leading article in the Times of to-day you appear to hint that the "figure" to be paid to Mdme Patti for my forthcoming season in the United States is "probably imaginary." I beg to inform you that Mdme Adelina Patti is engaged to me for six months, commencing in October next, to sing at least twice a week, for which she is to receive £917 a night. The sum of £9,170 has been already placed to her credit at her bankers, in New York, as a guarantee for the payment of the last ten nights' services. In addition to this, Mdme Patti will have her private Pullman travelling car, containing drawing and dining rooms, kitchen, and sleeping accommodation for the whole of her servants, as well as two cooks, who will accompany the expedition.—Your obedient servant,

J. H. MAPLESON.

Her Majesty's Theatre, May 12.

SIGNOR ARDITI has arrived in London. At Mr Mapleson's benefit at the Academy of Music, New York, as a parting gift from Signor Campanini, a massive pillow of roses was conveyed to Signor Arditi, and embedded among the roses was a case containing a silver bâton. Signor Arditi, in the course of the evening, came in for "another attention" in the form of a monster floral device, representing a lyre crowned with a laurel wreath, on the top of which was perched a white dove. The audience then gave the popular conductor a hearty round of applause.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

A programme of much and varied interest distinguished the fifth concert of the season, given in St James's Hall on Thursday evening May 11, and attracted a very large audience. The music composed by Weber for Wolff's drama Preciosa was one of the chief features, all of it being performed in connection with a concert-version of the play read by Mr S. Brandram. Preciosa, it will be remembered, was performed last season by the Meiningen company at Drury Lane, on which occasion we had an opportunity of calling attention to the great beauty and charm of Weber's music. There is no need to do this again, even if—which we greatly doubt—necessity existed then. The overture to Preciosa is known by every amateur, while the choral numbers and dance music are something more than a name to the vast majority. Hence, perhaps, the interest shown in the Philharmonic performance, which may be styled an exceptionally good one all round. Mr Cusins had his capital orchestra well in hand; Miss Santley sang the gipsy maiden's music with the taste and refinement that mark everything she does; and the choir discharged an easy task with success. The verses in which the "argument" of the play is stated are certainly not poetry, but they were read by Mr Brandram with a degree of point that an occasional slip did little to blunt. It is nevertheless to be feared that they wearied a part of the audience. Preciosa's story has been served up in so many forms that we cannot be expected to find in it much of the element of freshness. The music was a different thing, and, coming after some recent experiences, had the effect of a change from an atmosphere laden with artificial vapours to one impregnated with Nature's own health-giving properties. Following Preciosa came Mozart's "Mi tradi," with Madame Christine Nilsson to sing it, and by so doing to revive pleasant memories of her Donna Elvira in the Salzburg musician's masterpiece. Madame Nilsson had a very warm and sympathetic reception, answering to which she gave a fine reading of an air, instinct with the spirit of drama as well as of musical expression. Later in the evening Schubert's Serenade allowed her to display a no less remarkable measure of lyric feeling. In both cases the gratification of the audience may be imagined. Our old favourite, in retiring, made room for a stranger, Signor Sgambati, the Roman pianist and composer—one of the foremost musical representatives of young Italy. For his début as creator and executant Signor Sgambati chose a pianoforte concerto in G minor and major (Op. 15), recently produced by him in his own city. Something new and fresh was looked for, since there is nothing in the absolute nature of things which compels an Italian to follow the German model. Those who so anticipated were not doomed to disappointment. Signor Sgambati's concerto is in several respects of a novel character, though he has not chosen to set up, in outline at least, a new form. His work contains the regulation three movements, while those who listen carefully may observe a more or less familiar conformation. The novelty lies in details—in the ever-varying combination of the solo instrument with the orchestra, in the minute elaboration of passages, in the abiding predominance of simple melody over what is called "treatment," and in the studied play of attractive tone-colour. A strong concerto it is not, nor can we call it well-knit or logically sequential. But it charms all the same. With the instinct of his race, the composer appeals most to our sense of beauty, and if, as Aristotle says, beauty is better than all the letters of recommendation in the world, he brings in his concerto unimpeachable credentials. The slow movement is, perhaps, the gem, for reasons which, no doubt, we shall have a speedy opportunity of discussing. Signor Sgambati's playing has no affinity with the "blood and iron" style of his Teutonic contemporaries. He is not likely to break strings and make hammers fly, but clearly entertains the old-fashioned notion that a pianoforte is an instrument sui generis, and was never designed to be a bad imitation of an orchestra. Hence his style is one of singular delicacy and refinement, combined with great facility and accuracy. The new-comer must, of course, be heard in some great classic before his claims can be definitely estimated, but our present idea is that we have amongst us a thorough pianist in the strict sense of the term—one who understands his instrument, has mastered it, and will not be tempted to abuse his power. In the balance of the programme were Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, the overture to Tannhäuser, and a few short pianoforte solos.—D. T.

DVORÁK'S SYMPHONY.

Every musician ambitious of reaching the highest pinnacle of fame will, sooner or later, try his 'prentice or master hand on symphony. The inexhaustible resources of the modern orchestra supply full materials wherewith to build and decorate any fabric his fancy might call forth. Fancy should be, like all agencies, subject to restraints—the restraints of form. Only in dreams, or visions of lunacy, is it left to roam a lawless vagabond. To be utilized it must cling to the support that reason and science offer to the framework provided to keep the gossamer texture from falling into a tangled maze. The imagination and emotion of the tone-poet need, then, scaffolding, however slightly bound together, upon which to spread proportions that otherwise would collapse entirely. Dvorák, one of the youngest of the symphonists, laden with the first-fruits of his genius, comes to the shrine to lay thereon an offering in homage to the founders and builders of the art-temple. It is only the insensate egotist who will turn his back upon the past. The proudest flower of the garden hides not signs of a humble parentage, neither does it discard helps that have enabled it to fight the long battle for existence. Only the wilful, vain musician is seen to spurn contrivances that hitherto have kept his art alive. To gradually set loose and part with that which is no longer necessary is a very different process to tearing away branches and stems upholding leaf and blossom. Is not evolution seen in music as in all things else? One form in nature rises into another, to be superseded in turn by that which makes a fresh starting point. But of late there has been visible in art a disposition to push aside, according to a reckless logic, all past conventionalities of form. In other words, to revert to primitive elements or chaos. It is forgotten that progressive conventionalities in art are steps leading to higher ground, as the onward modes of species and orders in nature are gradations always tending to a riper and fuller development.

The symphony of Dvorák is of the family of Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, and Beethoven. Dvorák, with Mendelssohn, Schumann, and Brahms, effectually controverts the dictum of Wagner, who declared that Beethoven had said the last word in absolute music. The last word! Heaven forbid. May Dvorák give us many more such discourses in absolute music as his Symphony in D, and add thereby proofs, other than the thousand already registered, of the fallibility of the harsh-tongued censor of Bayreuth. Escaping from that dreary, tangled wilderness, the Rhinegold music, how refreshing it was to listen to the fancies of one who paid the listener respect by being intelligible and agreeable! The impression wrought by hearing the symphony for the first time was one of unqualified delight. Although a Beethovenish halo encircles the work, there is by no means a lack of individuality. There will be found, and no mistake, the hand of Dvorák, if the voice of Beethoven be sometimes heard. The performance at St James's Hall on Monday evening, May 15, was remarkably fine. No wonder, Herr Hans Richter directed, and to him Dvorák has dedicated his symphony. The renowned conductor has gathered many laurels, but perhaps the most enduring honour will be the association thus made of his name with the first published symphony of Dvorák.

NEW YORK.—"The New Operahouse will be protected from fire," says the Boston Musical Record, "if the builders can secure immunity. The entire building is to be of brick and iron. No stud partitions, wooden lath or timbered floors, but solid walls of brick and tile, floors of iron beams and brick arches, and roofs of iron and tile, so that there will be really nothing to feed a fire except the scenery on and about the stage. This will be covered by a network of water pipes above the stage, so arranged that a burning heat unsolders the caps and causes the water to flow from the pipes like a huge water-pot, reaching every part of the stage. Some of the pipes revolve by the force of the stream they throw, and the stage could be completely drenched in a few minutes."

In a Wood.

Wandering in the weird fir-wood
On this blue May-morn is good.

High up, and out of sight, birds sing
More soft and strange than anything:

One pipes, some warble wild, until
At times the whole of them are still;

And the cool air that comes to me
Smells of the mountains and the sea.

But presently it is a breeze
That wakes a whispering in the trees;

And then a vague dim phantom roar
Like tides upon the shingly shore

And wail of refluent waves that die.
I thought it sounded like the sigh

That follows on a mystic word
Misunderstood if not unheard—

The sigh that bears a message vain
Back to the Infinite again.

And, gazing skyward whence I lay,
I saw the tall stems rock and sway
Slowly, for something past away.

RICHARD WAGNER v. JEWS AND JUDAISM.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

Herr Edward Hanslick has informed the readers of The Musical World that Richard Wagner, aiming yet further "at his own self-glorification," has lately published another pamphlet under the title of Das Judenthum in der Musik ("Judaism in Music"), in which, by manifesting his implacable hatred of Jews, and of everything Jewish, he again indulges his petulant humour. Jewish musical genius, as exhibited in the immortal compositions of illustrious Jewish composers, will maintain its fame despite the virulent assaults of the "Apostle of the Future of Music."

Jews have nothing to fear from the inane attacks of mischievous, bitter-natured men whose acid malevolence would tempt them to plant daggers in the hearts of an ancient, illustrious race, to aid oppression, and to murder the grand reputation of a renowned people. It is beyond any human power to arrest Jewish progress. He is not to be envied, who would endeavour to injure the national and social character of the most ancient religious people in the world. It would be a useless waste of time and argument to attempt to convince modern traducers of Jews that they are not alone committing a foolish blunder, but an unpardonable crime in striving to excite a rancorous feeling between Christians and Jews whose mutual interest it is to dwell together in amity and peace. It would be difficult to assign a rational motive which should induce men to go out of their way to revive religious hate. To men of crooked minds and twisted tempers, to the envious and malicious, it must indeed be gall and wormwood to witness, without the power of impeding it, the rapid and steady rise of the Jews of Europe, America, and the British Colonies, and to be reluctantly constrained to admit the patent fact. It would seem to be, for some persons, as much a physical as a moral necessity to seek in calumny and slander some temporary alleviation from a plethora of mental irritation which might otherwise tend to disturb their intellectual equilibrium.

Jews of all countries have held their own through so many centuries of dire persecution and irrepressible opposition, compared with which the present spiteful and malignant anti-Semitic agitation in Germany (and Russia?—Dr Blidge) is as naught, that they can well afford to deride their actual traducers, if it were only on the score of the unpardonable and most strange ignorance which they display of Jewish character and conduct, and of their aspirations and daily pursuits.

"Viewing," says Lord Beaconsfield, "the influence of the Jewish race upon the modern communities, without any reference to their past history, or the future promises of Israel; dismissing from our minds and memories, if indeed that be possible, all that the Jews have done in the olden time for man, and all which it may be their destiny yet to fulfil, we hold that instead of being an object of aversion they should receive all that honour and favour from the Northern and Western races, which, in civilized and refined nations, should be the lot of those who charm the public taste and elevate the public feeling. We do not hesitate to say that there is no race at this present—and following in this only the example of a long period—that so much delights and fascinates, and elevates and ennobles Europe as the Jewish."*

CHARLES KENSINGTON SALAMAN.

(1850.)

We have no need to begin by demonstrating the Jewification of modern art; it is evident and strikes the senses at once. We should be led to far too great lengths, were we to attempt explaining this phenomenon from the character of the history of our art itself. If, however, the most necessary thing strikes us as being emancipation from the oppression of Judaism, we must consider it particularly important to test our resources for this conflict for deliverance. We shall not, however, obtain these resources from an abstract definition of the phenomenon itself, but by rendering ourselves intimately acquainted with the nature of the inherent involuntary feeling, which manifests itself to us as an instinctive antipathy for Jewish ways; from this feeling, this invincible feeling, if we avow it with perfect sincerity, what we hate in the Jewish character and ways must become clear to us; what we then know definitely we can oppose; nay, from its mere naked exposure, we may hope to beat the demon from the field, where he can maintain himself only by the defence of a hazy half darkness, a darkness that we good-natured humanitarians ourselves threw over him, in order to render his aspect less repulsive.

The Jew, who, as everyone knows, possesses a God all to himself, strikes us first, in common life, by his external appearance, which, no matter to what European nationality we belong, is marked by something disagreeably foreign to that nationality; we involuntarily desire to have nothing to do with a being of such an appearance. Formerly this could not fail to be considered a misfortune for the Jew; in more recent times, we perceive, however, that he feels quite at his ease under it; after his successes, his difference from us must strike him as a distinction. Passing over the moral side of the effect of this, in itself, disagreeable freak of Nature, we will here merely mention, with reference to art, that such an exterior can never be conceived by us as an object of representative art; when creative art desires to represent Jews, it generally takes its models from the imagination, wisely ennobling, or completely omitting exactly everything that characterizes the appearance of the Jew in common life. But never does the Jew lose his way on to the stage; the exceptions are, with respect to their number and rarity, such as merely support the general assumption. We cannot fancy any ancient or modern character, be it that of a hero or of a lover, represented on the stage by a Jew, without our involuntarily feeling the unfitness, amounting to absurdity, of such a performance.* This is an exceedingly important fact; a man whose appearance we consider renders him incapable of artistic representation, not in this or that character merely, but, by his very nature, altogether, cannot be deemed capable of artistically manifesting himself in any way.

Incomparably more important, nay, decisively important, however, is the contemplation of the effect which the Jew produces upon us by his speech; and this, indeed, is the essential point whence to commence our investigation of the Jewish influence upon music.—The Jew speaks the language of the nation with whom he lives, but he speaks it always like a foreigner. As it does not form part of our plan to occupy ourselves with the reasons of this phenomenon either, we may, also, refrain from indicting Christian civilization, which kept the Jew in his forced state of isolation, just as, on the other hand, by touching upon the results of that isolation, it is not in any way our intention to accuse the Jews, but, on the contrary, it is incumbent on us to throw a light upon the æsthetic character of these facts. In the first place, generally, the fact that the Jew speaks modern European languages only as acquired and not as inborn languages, must deprive him of all capability of expressing himself in them, according to his own nature, originally and independently. A language, with its expression and its development, is not the work of single individuals, but of a historical community; only he who has unconsciously grown up in this community takes any part in what it creates. The Jew, however, has stood outside every such community, alone with his Jehovah; he belonged to a race dispersed, and without a country of its own; a race to which all development from within itself was necessarily denied, while even its own language (Hebrew) has been preserved for the Jew of to-day only as a dead language. To be a true poet in a foreign tongue has hitherto been impossible, even for the greatest geniuses. Our entire European civilization and art have, however, remained for the Jew a foreign language; the unhappy, homeless being has taken part neither in the formation of the latter, nor in the development of the former, but, cold, and even inspired with a hostile spirit, has at most simply looked on. In such a language, and in such an art, the Jew can only speak as he hears others speak; he can merely imitate, not be a poet, truly speaking himself, or produce works of art.

What, however, is particularly repulsive to us is the purely material mode of speaking peculiar to the Jews. Civilization has not succeeded in conquering, by an intercourse of two thousand years with European nations, the singular obstinacy of the Jewish disposition with regard to the pecularities of Semitic pronunciation. What first strikes our ear as particularly strange and disagreeable is the hissing, screeching, buzzing, grunting character of the Jewish way of speaking; a manner, entirely foreign to our national language, of employing, and an arbitrary system of twisting about, the words and the construction of phrases, imparts, moreover, to it the character of an insupportably confused gabble, on hearing which our attention is involuntarily directed more to the repulsive How than to the What contained in it. How exceptionally important this circumstance is to explain, more especially the impression produced on us by the musical works of modern Jews, must, above all things, be recognized and remembered. If we hear a Jew speak, we are unconsciously offended by the absence of all purely human expression in his speech; the cold indifference of his peculiar lingo, never, on any occasion, rises to the excitement of really heartfelt passion. If, however, when speaking to a Jew, we find ourselves impelled to give more than ordinarily animated expression to what we say, he will always avoid us, because he is incapable of replying. The Jew never grows excited in the mutual interchange of sentiments with us, but, as far as we are concerned, solely and exclusively in the especial interest of his vanity or of his pocket, a fact which, combined with the disfiguring effect of his way of speaking generally, imparts to his excitement a character of ridiculousness, and produces on us anything save sympathy for the interest of the person thus speaking. Though, of course, we consider it probable that, among themselves, when treating of matters in which they are mutually concerned, and, especially, in their families, when purely human emotion overflows in them, even Jews are capable of giving utterance to their feelings, this cannot be taken into account here, where we have to consider the Jew as, in the intercourse of life and the relations of art, he speaks to us.

But if the peculiarity, as described above, of his way of talking renders the Jew pretty well incapable of manifesting his feelings and views artistically by speech, his capability for such a manifestation through the instrumentality of song is necessarily far less. Song is nothing more than spoken language excited by the strongest degree of passion; music is the language of passion. Now, if the Jew elevates his mode of talking, in which he can communicate his thoughts to us only with irritability, producing a ludicrous effect, but never with sympathetically moving passion, he becomes, the instant he does so, simply unbearable. Everything which, in his external appearance, and his language had a repulsive effect on us, in his singing absolutely drives us away, directly we are no longer attracted by the utter ludicrousness of such an exhibition. In song, as the most animated and irrefutably most truthful expression of the whole system of personal feelings, the peculiarity, so repulsive to us, of Jewish nature, reaches its culminating point, and, in conformity with a natural assumption, we should suppose the Jew capable of artistic tendencies in every other domain of art, rather than in that based upon song.

The gift of material perception possessed by the Jews has never been able to produce from among them adepts in the plastic arts; their eye has always been busied with far more practical things than beauty and the intellectual purport of the world of form. No one ever heard, in our time, as far as I am aware, of a Jewish architect or sculptor; whether modern painters of Jewish descent have really created anything in their art is a fact which I must leave professional judges to decide; it is very probable, however, that the position occupied by such artists with regard to plastic art is not different from that of modern Jewish composers with regard to music, and we shall now proceed to consider more nearly this said position.

* On this head, a great deal may, it is true, be said, after what has been recently done by Jewish actors, a fact to which I here allude only in a cursory manner. The Jew has not only succeeded at present in taking possession of the dramatic stage, but even in tricking the poet out of his dramatic creations; a celebrated Jewish "character-actor" no longer represents the personages of Shakspere, Schiller, &c., as written by the poets, but substitutes for them the creatures of his own conception, which are effective, and not without a certain purpose. This system produces much about the effect which would be produced if we were to cut from out a picture of the Crucifixion the portrait of our Saviour, and stick a demagogical Jew in its place. The falsification of our art on the stage has become a perfect deception, on which account, also, Shakspere and such like are mentioned only conditionally with reference to their adaptability for performance.

The complete pianoforte arrangement, music and text, of Wagner's Parsifal has been published by Schott & Sons, Mayence.

ORGAN APPOINTMENT.—Mr Edward R. Terry, late of St Peter's, Paddington, has been appointed organist of St James's, Camberwell. At the latter church there is full Cathedral Service. The organ, a very fine one, by Walker, consists of three manuals, and was originally built for the Gloucester Festival.—(Communicated.)

ALBANI'S VIOLETTA.—One of the specialities of our Italian operatic season occurred when Mdme Albani made her re-appearance as Violetta, in La Traviata, a character to which she again gave importance, both in its musical and dramatic aspect. The bright and fluent delivery of the "Brindisi" in the first act was finely contrasted by the pathos of the opening andantino of the scena, "Ah! fors'è lui," which again imparted additional effect to the closing movement, in which the brilliant execution and silvery high notes of the singer's voice were displayed with triumphant success. In the duets with Alfredo and the elder Germont genuine tenderness and sentiment were shown, the expression of self-sacrifice and unquenchable love for Alfredo being admirably rendered. The despairing agony of the dying Violetta in the last scene was a display of intense dramatic feeling, all the more impressive because free from exaggeration. Mdme Albani's performance afforded another proof of her versatility as well as her excellence both as singer and actress. She was enthusiastically received throughout.—Daily News.

CONCERTS.

Mr Charles Hallé's Concerts.—For several years past the concerts given by Mr Charles Hallé in St James's Hall, during the summer season, though called "Recitals," have really been concerts of chamber music, akin to those directed by Mr Arthur Chappell. With a removal from the building in Regent Street to the Grosvenor Gallery, Mr Hallé has given his enterprise its proper name, and the first of a series of eight "Chamber Music Concerts" took place in the large saloon on Wednesday evening. * * * The programme contained nothing but works of interest and value, beginning with Dvorák's pianoforte quartet in D (Op. 43). Great way is just now being made amongst us by the Prague composer, who lived for forty years before his own countrymen discovered more than ordinary talent in the man. We English are sometimes accused of being slow to perceive the subtle gifts that qualify a great composer; but Dvorák cannot take up any such parable against us, albeit the distinctiveness of his style is not covered by his adherence to classic forms. Our amateurs received his music kindly at the beginning, and now anything from his pen is anticipated with zest, and heard with a stronger feeling than curiosity. Dvorák is well represented by the quartet in D, of which the slow movement, with its delightful variations, lingers long in the memory. A better performance than that by Mdme Norman-Néruda, Herr Strauss, Herr Franz Néruda, and Mr Hallé, the most exigent could hardly have desired. Mr Hallé next introduced, in his own finished style, the two Rhapsodies of Brahms, not long ago played at a Popular Concert by Miss Krebs, and then noticed by us. Following these came Handel's violin sonata in D,* for which Mr Hallé had written a pianoforte accompaniment of some elaboration, but yet strictly in the manner of the master. The performance of this work by Mdme Néruda and the concert-giver afforded a rare treat. Mdme Néruda never played with more grace, delicacy, and spirit. Her execution was finished to the last degree, while broad enough in style for the robust nature of some of the movements. Briefly, it showed a rare union of high qualities. Schumann's pianoforte quartet ended a concert none the less enjoyed by a large and distinguished company because in the intervals the eye could feast on the works of art with which the Grosvenor Gallery is just now richly stored.

Symphony Concerts.—The second concert of the present series was given in St James's Hall on Friday evening, May 12, and attended by, amongst many other conspicuous amateurs, their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh. It is to be regretted that the general public were not present in greater numbers. A performance more enjoyable and, at the same time, more instructive is rarely placed within their reach. We do not, however, affect surprise at a comparatively thin house, the truth being obvious that this season the supply of musical entertainment is in excess of any possible demand. Weber's overture to Euryanthe opened the concert, and, after the "Ocean" scene from Oberon had been finely sung by Frau Sachse-Hofmeister, was followed by Schubert's great Symphony in C, generally known as No. 9, but classed in the programme book as No. 10. Here Mr Hallé and his orchestra had a splendid opportunity of showing what they jointly and severally could do, and right good use was made of it. A more perfect rendering of the beautiful work we cannot call to mind. We should have preferred the scherzo (allegro vivace) taken a shade faster; but this is a matter of taste. As to matters of fact, we have absolutely no criticism to offer. Every detail seemed as perfect as care and skill could make it. The reception of each movement under such circumstances could be no other than cordial, and, indeed, a strong desire to hear the Andante con moto over again was shown by a part of the audience. Keen interest, excited by Schubert's masterpiece, did not flag during the subsequent performance of Beethoven's music to Goethe's Egmont, save, perhaps, when time was needlessly taken up by Mr Clifford Harrison's conscientious recital of the "argument" of the play, together with a small portion of its dialogue. Beethoven's work having been performed at the Crystal Palace on one or two occasions within easy memory, a discussion of its merits need hardly be entered upon. It naturally suffers by severance from the acted drama; yet the abstract beauty of the various movements and their dramatic appropriateness enforce acknowledgment even in the concert room. The overture—one of the master's gloomiest, noblest, and most concise musical poems—made a great effect as usual, while the two little-known songs, sung by Mdme Sachse-Hofmeister, were heard with interest and received with applause. An air from Gluck's Iphigenia and Svendsen's fifth Norwegian Rhapsody brought this most excellent and enjoyable concert to an end.—P. G.

Richter Concerts.—At the third concert of the series, given in St James's Hall on Monday night, Dvorák's Symphony in D was produced, and received with marked approval by an audience which made up in interested attention for paucity of numbers. The symphony was played, for the first time in England, at the Crystal Palace last month, and then introduced the Bohemian composer as one who, through the highest form of instrumental music, appeals to the judgment, not of a locality, but of the world. When Dvorák had the ear of his own countrymen only, he wrote Sclavonian Rhapsodies for their delight. But now that Europe listens to him he composes symphonies. The change of direction, and enlargement of purpose are good, especially when they give us a work so elaborate, noble, and beautiful as that performed on Monday. The new symphony must be heard more than once in order to meet with full appreciation, and until it has been so heard we shall postpone criticism. Enough now that we may speak of Dvorák as a master whose future labours in the highest branch of his art will be watched with interest and regarded with a feeling nearer to assurance of resultant good than to merely hope of it. The performance, under Herr Richter, was full of spirit and distinguished by many excellencies. With Dvorák's work were associated the great scena from Der Freyschütz, sung by Mdme Marie Roze; a prelude and fugue of Bach for violin alone, played with extraordinary skill by Herr Rappoldi; and the "German Requiem" of Brahms, which last brought with it a great disappointment. Amateurs had hoped for a performance of special merit, but, as a matter of fact, Brahms' grand and solemn music received a very indifferent rendering, the choral numbers suffering most of all. We will not dwell upon this failure, since it is clear that Herr Richter can hardly be identified with a disaster of the sort and not promptly retrieve it. The solos in the Requiem were entrusted to Mdme Roze and Mr King.

Mdlle Alice Roselli gave her annual concert in the Steinway Hall on Tuesday evening, May 2nd, when the performance of an excellent programme delighted a large and fashionable audience. The lady is known to be the possessor of a voice of considerable capacity that has received the benefit of careful and sufficient training. Her singing in songs by Roeckel and Milton Wellings was marked by an intelligence that added force and charm to more material qualities. In all the fair artist undertook her success was most complete with her friends, patrons, and the general public. She was assisted by several eminent vocalists, amongst whom must be specially named Miss Santley, daughter of the celebrated and esteemed baritone. Miss Helen Meason has also claims on our attention, for her vocalization is always refined and engaging. Mdme Enriquez never fails to command the admiration a superb voice and artistic culture bring. She made a great success in Blumenthal's new song, "Our Ships at Sea," which had the advantage of being accompanied by the composer. Mr W. H. Cummings always proves himself to be the possessor of artistic qualities that few enjoy. In addition to Clay's "I'll sing thee songs of Araby," he favoured the company with one of his own, "Just as of old." Both song and singer were most acceptable. The other artists were Miss Kipping, Miss Lilia Reynolds, Mr Jessurum, Mr Frank May, Mr Sydney Smith, Herr Joseph Ludwig, Mr Bird, Mr Lindsay Sloper, and Sig. Ciro Pinsuti.—D. E.

Temple Church.—Programme of Organ Recital by Mr E. J. Hopkins, on Tuesday afternoon, May 16:—

Part I.—Overture, Occasional Oratorio (Handel); Air Variée (Haydn); Allegro Vivace (Morandi); Motet (Mendelssohn); Largo (Beethoven); Fugue, in E flat—by desire—(J. S. Bach).

Part II.—Postlude, in C major (Henry Smart); Andante, in C major (Mendelssohn); Terzetto for Soprano Voices (Henry Smart); Fanfare (J. Lemmens); Andante Religioso, in B flat, and Allegretto, in F—by desire—(Mendelssohn); Adagio and Allegro, in D (Mozart).

The recital displayed the superb quality of the instrument, and the exquisite skill of the performer.

Miss Rosa Kenney gave her second recital on the afternoon of Monday, May 15th, at the Marlborough Rooms, when a distinguished audience enjoyed a most agreeable entertainment. The elocutionary powers of this young lady are well known and deservedly appreciated—and no wonder, for talents, inherited from a race remarkable in the dramatic and literary art, have in her case been seriously cultivated. We cannot but think progress had been made even during the short space of time that separated the recital under notice from its predecessor. Passages pointed with archness, phrases overflowing with tender pathos, and vocal modulations rounding off the periods, made evident that Miss Rosa Kenney acknowledges no finality in culture. Her excellent elocution had full scope in the "Vision of Joan of Arc," written by the late Charles Lamb Kenney—who for many years enlivened the pages of the Musical World with his brilliant wit—in a scene from the School for Scandal (with Mr John Maclean), and the Potion scene from Shakspere's Romeo and Juliet. She was assisted on this occasion by Mr Arthur Sketchley (the inimitable "Mrs Brown") and Mrs Aylmer Gowing. Miss Ada Iggulden sang Roeckel's "Dream of a Violet," and Mr C. P. Colnaghi rendered Clay's "I'll sing you songs of Araby." Mr H. Stafford Trego presided at the pianoforte.—D. E.

On Tuesday, the 16th inst, a concert was given by Mr J. Greenhill at Tolmer Square Institute. The first part was taken up with Sterndale Bennett's cantata, The May Queen, in which Mdlle Lilas Spontini rendered, with a great deal of feeling and talent, the soprano part, notwithstanding that she had evidently been suffering from a severe cold. Nevertheless, she was very much applauded, as was Mr Baly, who undertook the bass part in the cantata. We trust often to hear Mdlle Spontini in the concert-room. She is already in great request at the fashionable soirées of the nobility. In the second part of the concert we listened, with a great deal of pleasure, to a cantata from the pen of Mr Greenhill, sung by his choir of young pupils, which met with a good reception from the public. We must not omit to chronicle that Mr and Mrs Frith were among those who gave their valuable assistance at the concert.

A large audience assembled in the Holborn New Town Hall at the first concert given by the Holborn Orchestral and Choral Society. The singers were Misses Ellis Walton and Evelyn Hope, and Mr John Cross. The instrumentalists were Mr W. Levey (violin), Mr J. Joyce (flute), Mr. James Clinton (clarinet), and Mr F. Sewell Southgate (pianoforte); Mr Southgate also, in conjunction with Mr W. J. Fleet, accompanied the singers. Both orchestra and chorus did justice to their training—the first-named by their performance of Boieldieu's overture to The Caliph of Bagdad and a minuet by Boccherini, and the choir by the way in which they rendered the choral parts in Professor Macfarren's cantata, The May Queen, especially the final chorus, "The Revels." Miss Evelyn Hope gained much applause in the air, "Beautiful May," which the audience would gladly have heard again. Miss Walton and Mr John Cross gave due expression to the duet, "Parigi, o cara," (Traviata), and in Brahms' "Death of Nelson" Mr John Cross obtained a unanimous encore. The pianoforte solos, "Lullaby" and "Verulam Mazurka," by Mr F. Sewell Southgate, were remarkably well played by the composer. The duet announced in the programme for flute and clarinet ("Lo, here the gentle lark"), to be played by Messrs Joyce and Clinton, was not given, Mr Clinton's clarinet having accidentally fallen from the music stand, and in consequence was too much damaged to be used at the time. Mr W. Levey played M. Sainton's violin fantasie on Lucrezia Borgia with considerable brilliancy, and the concert altogether gave perfect satisfaction.

PROVINCIAL.

Anerley.—Miss Alba Phillips gave a matinée on Saturday, May 13th, at the Maple Hall Schoolroom, which was well attended by the parents of her pupils and residents in the neighbourhood. Several of Miss Phillips' advanced pupils sang with excellent taste. Among the most prominent were the Misses Williams and Cornwell (who, in Mendelssohn's two-part song, "I would that my love," received much applause), Misses Maud Robinson, Humphrey, and Adams. The young and talented elocutionist, Miss Louise Ball, recited Planche's "Cheap Dinner," and "Willie's Grave," receiving after each enthusiastic applause.

Taunton.—Sterndale Bennett's Woman of Samaria and G. A. Macfarren's May Day will be given by the Pitminster Choral Society, under the direction of Mr Thomas J. Dudeney, in the National Schoolroom on Monday morning and evening next, the 22nd inst. The singers will be—Misses Dansey and French, Mr H. B. Goldsmith, and the Rev. Spencer Jones. Miss Fowle will preside at the pianoforte and Mrs Crump at the organ.

Maidenhead.—Arthur Sullivan's beautiful cantata, On Shore and Sea, has been performed with great success by the Maidenhead Philharmonic Society in the Town Hall.

Manchester.—Dr. Bridge's cantata, Boadicea, was recently given with unanimous approval in the Concert Hall, at a performance for the benefit of the Royal Infirmary.

Crystal Palace.—There is to be no performance at the Crystal Palace to-day, but the concerts will be resumed next week. These admirable entertainments have a long score against us, which shall be promptly considered and definitively arranged.

Bayreuth.—The full dress rehearsal of Parsifal was to have taken place before a specially invited circle. This arrangement, however, is abandoned. The King of Bavaria having signified his intention of being present, that eccentric Royal Satrap will constitute the whole audience in his person.

Mdme Christine Nilsson.—Ever ready to identify herself with a good cause, Mdme Christine Nilsson will give a concert in St James's Hall, on June 23, for the benefit of a fund now being raised with a view to repair and beautify the English Protestant church in the Rue Daguesseau, Paris. We understand that the request of Lord Lyons for the patronage of Her Majesty the Queen has been graciously acceded to, and that other members of the Royal family, including the Prince and Princess of Wales, take a sympathetic interest in the success of the occasion. As Mdme Nilsson may confidently be expected to associate with her own attraction that of the best available talent, the entertainment will doubtless be worthy of its object, its giver, and its illustrious supporters. While referring to the popular Swedish artist, the fact of her engagement to appear at the Royal Italian Opera invites remark. In view of the forthcoming production of Boïto's Mefistofele Mr Gye has been well advised to secure the creator, in this country, of the parts of Marguerite and Helen of Troy. The attraction added to this stage cannot be over-estimated, and we hope that Mdme Nilsson will have an opportunity of appearing in other rôles closely identified with her fame. Her engagement, on very high terms, to play in America next winter is, we believe, no longer a matter of rumour, but of fact. She will be received across the Atlantic with open arms by the thousands of amateurs who vividly remember her previous successes amongst them.

London amateurs will have an opportunity of being present at the first representation in the metropolis of F. H. Cowen's sacred cantata, Saint Ursula, written for the Norwich Festival of last year, which is to be given at St James's Hall on Thursday next. Mr Cowen will also introduce on the same occasion his Scandinavian Symphony, which recently met with such success at Vienna.

Würzburg.—Alexander Adam, formerly pupil of the Stuttgart Conservatory, who carried off the Mozart and Mendelssohn Exhibitions prizes, is appointed Music-Director at the Stadttheater.

NEW YORK MUSIC FESTIVAL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The greatest musical festival that this country has had began last Tuesday evening. I do not consider as music the extraordinary affair which occurred in Boston some years ago, under the direction of an Irish bandmaster named Gilmore, when ten thousand singers and an orchestra of one thousand performers went through national songs and much musical trash to the accompaniment of one hundred anvils and fifty canons. In 1869 we had a music festival in New York, at which the late Parepa Rosa was the chief singer, and Carl Bergman, also now dead, the conductor. Last year, as you know, Dr Damrosch organized a festival upon a large scale, using the Oratorio Society as a nucleus around which to gather the choruses from a dozen neighbouring towns. The chief festival singers were Gerster and Campanini. The expenses were about £16,000, and the receipts £20,000. Before the affair was well over, Theodore Thomas, Damrosch's rival, had induced several wealthy patrons of music to subscribe £10,000 toward a guaranty fund for a music festival in 1882. The drill-room of the Seventh Regiment Armoury (a hall two hundred feet wide and six hundred feet long), was rented for one week at £2,000, and, upon the strength of the guaranty fund, a score of eminent composers and virtuosi were invited to take part. Letters were written to Rubinstein, Liszt, Wagner, Brahms, Joachim, Frau Wilt, and Frau Materna. Rubinstein replied that he would not think of this country again until his book account gave out, and all except Materna declined the invitation. She consented to come and sing fifteen times for £2,500, and the expenses for three persons. At the time of Materna's engagement there was some thought of giving one opera of the Wagner tetralogy complete—probably Siegfried—but that has been given up.

In October last the chief works of the future festival were determined upon, and the choral societies of Boston, Philadelphia, and some smaller towns were invited to assist. The whole choral force numbers about 3,200 voices. Among the solo singers engaged were Materna, Candidus, Campanini, Miss Winant, Mrs A. E. Osgood, Whitney—the best basso heard here in late years—and Henschel. The orchestra, as finally constituted, numbered 300 musicians:—

50 first violins, 50 second violins, 36 violas, 36 violoncellos, 40 double basses, 6 harps, 6 flutes, 2 piccolos, 6 oboes, 2 English horns, 6 clarinets, 2 Basset horns, 2 bass clarinets, 6 bassoons, 2 contra bassoons, 9 horns, 8 saxhorns, 6 cornets, 4 trumpets, 1 bass trumpet, 6 tenor trombones, 2 bass trombones, 2 tubas, 4 kettle-drums, 2 bass drums, 2 small drums, 2 cymbals, 2 triangles.

The programmes for the whole festival are as follows:—

Tuesday Evening, May 2.—Cantata, A Stronghold Sure (Bach), Miss Winant, Mr William Candidus, and Mr M. W. Whitney. Symphony, C major (Köchel, 551), (Mozart). Recitative and Aria, "Abschenlicher" (Fidelio), (Beethoven), Frau Friedrich Materna. Jubilate (Utrecht), (Handel), Miss Winant, Mr Theodore J. Toedt, and Mr Georg Henschel.

Wednesday Afternoon, May 3.—Iphigenia in Aulis (Gluck), (a) Overture; (b) Scene i., "Diane impitoyable," Signor Antonio F. Galassi. Symphony in C major, No. 9 (Schubert). Aria, "Der Hölle Rache" (Magic Flute) (Mozart), Mdme Etelka Gerster. Overture (Manfred), (Schumann). Aria, "Der Kriegelust ergeben" (Jessonda), (Spohr), Mr Georg Henschel. Recitative and Aria, "Ocean, thou mighty monster" (Oberon), (Weber), Frau Friedrich Materna. Aria, "Vainement Pharaon" (Joseph), (Mehul), Signor Italo Campanini. Overture (Ruy Blas), Mendelssohn.

Wednesday Evening, May 3.—Symphony in C minor, No. 5, Op. 67 (Beethoven). Missa Solemnis, D major (Op. 123), Frau Friedrich Materna, Miss Winant, Mrs E. Aline Osgood, Signor Italo Campanini, Signor Antonio F. Galassi, Mr William Candidus, and Mr Georg Henschel.

Galassi. 3. Siegfried. Grand Scene: The Forging of the Sword, Signor Italo Campanini, and Mr Theodore J. Toedt. 4. Die Götterdämmerung. (a) Siegfried's Death, Orchestra; (b) Finale, Brünnhilde's Immolation, Frau Friedrich Materna.

Friday Evening, May 5th.—Handel's oratorio, Israel in Egypt. Mrs E. Aline Osgood, Miss Winant, Miss Hattie Schell, Mr William Candidus, Mr Franz Remmertz, and Mr M. W. Whitney.

Saturday Afternoon, May 6th.—Sonata in D, (Arcangelo Corelli), String Orchestra. Aria di Chiesa, "Se i miei sospiri," (Alessandro Stradella), Miss Emily Winant. Menuetto, (Luigi Boccherini), String Orchestra. Aria, "Pria che spunti" (Il Matrimonio Segreto), (Domenico Cimarosa), Signor Italo Campanini. Les Deux Journées (Luigi Cherubini), (a) Overture, Orchestra; (b) Seatetto Finale, "O Ciel!" (Act I.) La Vestale, (Gasparo Spontini), (a) Overture, Orchestra; (b) Scene: "Del tuo gran Ministero," (Act II.) Mdme Etelka Gerster, Mdme Galassi, and Signor Italo Campanini. Guglielmo Tell, (Gioacchino Antonio Rossini), (a) Overture, Orchestra; (b) Terzetto, (Act II.), Mr William Candidus, Mr Franz Remmertz, and Mr Myron W. Whitney. Duo, "Ah, Leonora il guardo" (La Favorita), (Gaetano Donizetti), Mdme Galassi, and Signor Antonio F. Galassi. Aria, "Ah, non giunge" (La Sonnambula), (Vincenzio Bellini), Mdme Etelka Gerster. Romanza, "Eri tu" (Un Ballo in Maschera), (Giuseppe Verdi), Signor Antonio F. Galassi. Overture (Re Lear), (Antonio Bazzini).

Saturday Evening, May 6th.—A symphony to Dante's "Divina Commedia" (Liszt), I. Inferno; II. Purgatorio, Magnificat, with chorus of women's voices and organ. Scena (Der Dämon, Act I.) (Rubinstein), Mdme Etelka Gerster. The Fall of Troy (Act II.) (Berlioz). Chorus (Die Meistersinger, Act III.) (Wagner), Chorus and Orchestra.

The Wagner concert was given yesterday afternoon, and proved to be the most successful of the series, so far—especially the share of the Trilogy falling to the orchestra and to Materna. The attendance has not quite equalled the expectations of the managers, who have spent about £28,000, and find the receipts at each concert not more than £3,300, which will leave a deficit of about £4,000. It is said now that the invitation of so many out-of-town choruses was injudicious, their railroad and hotel expenses while here costing many thousands of pounds. The list of solo singers is also too long. In so far as such affairs can be musically satisfactory, the festival has been a triumph. The orchestra has done wonders, and Materna has aroused a furore of enthusiasm by the breadth and power of her singing. The critics of the daily press unite in declaring the festival to be the finest musical event that we have had in this country.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL.

Having assisted at many disputes as to the capability of hearing in the upper regions of the Albert Hall, I determined to test for myself at the "Grand Concert" given on Wednesday, May 17, the possibility of doing so. Still clinging to the fables of early youth, and keeping in mind the history of the hare and the tortoise, for this once, I am happy to say, my convictions met their reward. Waiting till the crowd had surged in at the one shilling entrance, I wended my way upstairs, and was fortunate enough to secure a seat against the railings encircling the balcony—I will not say that one does hear or see, quite as distinctly as on a lower and nearer level, but you see and hear quite sufficiently to make it a most enjoyable afternoon. And in this age, when the full money's worth is exacted, the general public have their shilling's worth to the "uttermost farthing," for, added to this banquet of "sweet sounds," there is the enjoyment of a stroll round the gallery itself, one of the best lit and coolest galleries in London, and which, by the unflagging energy of the council of the Albert Hall, is filled with an exhibition of pictures and sculpture of unusual excellence. And it is well at a time when the "Academy" threatens to become in some measure a museum of antiquities, music's twin sister, should be encouraged in a spot eminently adapted to show the limner's art to advantage.

However, this is a digression; to return to the concert (in every way an admirable one). At a moment when the operatic stage is deprived of one of its greatest ornaments in the person of Mdme Christine Nilsson, it is a gratifying fact to think it is in the power not only of the restricted circle of the wealthy, but of all lovers of music, by means of so large an area as the Albert Hall, where the varying prices put it within the scope of every one, to enjoy the privilege of listening to the tones of her grand voice. The noble presence, the inspired face, of this fair northern "queen of song," her clear and liquid tones in "Angels ever bright and fair," that impregnated as they were with more than usual pathos, and which, filling that vast arena, floated upwards, and died in air, is a thing to remain in the memory—"a joy for ever."

Mdme Nilsson also sang the "Miserere" duet from the Trovatore, in which she was admirably seconded by Mr Maas. One of Mdme Nilsson's many gifts is, that she is as great an actress as she is a songstress—and, without any stage adjuncts, she seems to bring before one the scene of the "Orrida Torre" with all its sombre accessories—and when Manrico implores her not to forget him, the wonderful expression of the face—Forget thee! !—seems to render words unnecessary. With a grace that carries out the Latin proverb—"That he gives twice who gives quickly," Mdme Nilsson responded to the repeated and enthusiastic encore—as she did later in "Auld Robin Gray"—when she acceded to the energetic demand of the public by giving Mignon's pathetic "Connais-tu le pays?"—in which not the faintest tone of her lovely voice was lost in the hushed silence of that vast space.

Mdme Antoinette Sterling sang "Sunshine and rain" and the always favourite "Better Land," and returned to bow her acknowledgments of the repeated plaudits. Mr Maas in "The Message," in the duet from the Trovatore, and also in the trio (duel scene) from Faust with Signor Foli and Mr Sauvage, kept up well the reputation of our great English tenors. Signor Foli gave also "She alone charmeth my sadness" and the "Viking's Song." With his customary success Mr James Sauvage gave "Dio Possente" and "Revenge, Timotheus cries;" Mdlle Montini, "Stride la vampa" and "Me voilà seule enfin;" Miss Blandy (who replaced Miss Patti Winter, absent from indisposition), "She wandered down the mountain side" and "Sombre forêt." Space forbids saying more than that all and each were excellent, and with the playing of Mr William Carter and Mr E. Bending in the Barcarolle from Sir Sterndale Bennett's Fourth Concerto; Mr Charles Oberthür and Mr William Carter in Mr Oberthür's duet for harp and piano on airs from Lucrezia Borgia, (with the well-rendered choruses by the choir); the selection from Carmen, and Gounod's "Wedding March" by the Grenadier Guards under Mr Dan Godfrey, a programme was given so varied that it was almost an embarras de richesse. One felt loth to leave any one or anything unheard.—"CARLEON."

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

Meyerbeer's opera, L'Etoile du Nord, performed on Thursday night to a crowded house, was chosen for the first appearance this season of Mdme Adelina Patti. A most cordial welcome was given to the favourite prima donna, when, bright and engaging as ever, she tripped upon the stage in the character of Catarina. The high honours accorded to Mdme Patti for twenty years naturally made her reception a matter of certainty, and the first few notes uttered proved that the qualities which have so long kept her upon the highest pinnacle of fame as a lyric artist are still in her possession. The same rich voice, fuller, perhaps, in the lower notes, if less free in the upper register, captivates the ear, while brilliant execution never fails to add the charm of perfect culture. Mdme Patti's histrionic powers are, if anything, greater than ever. This was evidenced last night in the fascinations that captivated Gritzenko and his band of Calmucks; in the interviews with Pietro; as well as in the finals of the first act, when bidding farewell to home. Pathos, in voice and gesture, found full scope in the tent scene, whilst witnessing the orgies of her lover, and receiving from him the sentence of death; and the utmost tenderness was exhibited in the last scene, where the distraught maiden, listening to the melodies of earlier days, is restored to reason and happiness. Floral demonstrations were not wanting on the occasion, for the fair artist was loaded again and again with bouquets. M. Gailhard gave a rather lugubrious rendering of Pietro. Dignity of bearing was often sacrificed to lachrymose utterances. Signor Lestellier's voice is rather too weak and tremulous for most of the music in the part of Danilowitz, but it is only just to mention his success in the arioso, "Disperso et erin," towards the end of the work. Perhaps the most successful artist, after Mdme Adelina Patti, was Mdme Valleria (Prascovia), who not only acted with spirit, but sang with brilliancy and effect. The chorus and band were excellent, and M. Dupont conducted with judgment.—P. G.

The company from the Friedrich-Wilhelmstädtisches Theater, Berlin, have gone for a time to the Stadttheater, Bremen, where they opened with Johann Strauss's Lustiger Krieg.

THE RING OF THE NIBELUNG.

(From the "Musical Standard.")

When in 1845, on the first production of Tannhäuser at Dresden, I ventured to point to Richard Wagner as the herald and representative of a new era in art, and when, on the appearance of every fresh work by this master, my enthusiasm increased in ratio to its undeniable greatness, the whole body of musical critics fell upon me as one man with abuse. Even those who were somewhat kindly predisposed treated my enthusiasm as a mild case of insanity, whilst others were not chary of charging me with sacrilege of the most heinous kind in daring to attack the great masters who had preceded Wagner. I was pointed at as the "Iconoclast." Although it is with intense delight that I now behold time to have achieved what I so many years ago prophesied as the inevitable, yet in my wildest moments of hope I never counted on so speedy a fulfilment. Even in Bayreuth, in 1876, when surrounded with congenial enthusiasts, and the ultimate production of The Ring in England formed the topic of conversation, I said that, "like all truth the play would find its way to the land that could boast of the grandest and noblest literature;" but I should have considered it madness had I attempted to prognosticate so early a date. It is only owing to the concurrence of the most fortuitous circumstances that such an event could have come to pass. For, in order to successfully bring about the representation of so gigantic a play, a combination of talents are required rarely to be met with in one man. But Angelo Neumann, the director of the four cycles, possesses them all. To a large fortune he unites the personal qualities of enterprise, sagacity, and an amiable persuasiveness invaluable to the organizer and director of so colossal an undertaking. "Veni, vidi, vici" seems to be his motto. He has engaged his present company for four years, and intends giving representations of the "Tetralogy" in all the chief cities of Europe. And what a company it is! It would appear as if the impressario had ransacked Germany for female beauty and vigorous manhood. And what voices, too! Seriousness seems to be the staple commodity of all the artists, and is not "earnestness the greatest majesty of man?" as Bulwer Lytton has it. By this time every one is fully aware that "earnestness" is Wagner's great and sole aim in art, and that all his works are thoroughly impregnated with this necessary quality to success. The art principles of Wagner claim for the opera the most serious and heartfelt music. He eschews entirely the conventional form of arias and duets. With him the orchestra is an indispensable necessity, and he makes it delineate in the most marvellous manner the feelings and emotions of humanity. The "leading motives," which not only typify the different personæ, but also the most subtle workings of their innermost mind, invest his operas with an intense interest which the stereotyped forms of aria, duet, &c., of the old opera entirely failed to attain. This same earnestness prompted him from the first to develop his undeniable high gifts as a poet. With rare felicity he has preserved in the Nibelung's Ring the alliterative and simple, yet withal powerful, expressive form of the old Edda. The answer to those of his superficial critics who complain of the occasional use of commonplace diction is, that Wagner designedly utilized certain original expressions of the Edda because they represented the tonal reverberations of feelings and emotions when language was yet in its infancy. Again, the strictures of other critics in reference to the moral of the play must be at once disregarded, as all pre-Christian religions contain parallelisms of the frailty of human nature, and all point to one common origin, viz., the exaltation of human beings into gods and demigods. To the student of ancient history, the analogy between the Eddas and Sagas and Greek and Roman mythology will be at once evident, e.g., Wotan and Jupiter, Fricka and Juno, Freia and Venus, Loge and Mercury, Donner and Vulcan, &c. Another reproach hurled at Wagner is that he did not invent his own story, but sought it in the land of myth; but, I would ask, was Shakspere the original author of all those stories which he has clothed with such wondrous language; and did Faust emanate from the brain of the renowned Goethe? and yet are these masters any the less great for having appropriated popular legends?

GERMAN OPERA, DRURY LANE.

On Thursday night Herren Franke and Pollini opened their long-announced season of German opera in our national theatre—a place by no means new to such an enterprise. We do not intend to discuss just now the character and prospects of the venture, but may mention what lies beyond the range of discussion—namely, that it is being made at a time when only merit of the highest order can command remunerative support. Never were the musical amateurs of London distracted by such a number of conflicting claims as at the present moment, and it is clear that all cannot receive the patronage they need, nor even such as they deserve. But the best will be best treated, for even in a world sometimes said to be out of joint that which most merits success gets, as a rule, the largest share of it. Calling this to mind, we may augur well for the new German opera, since it gave last night the most efficient representation of Lohengrin ever known in this country. Let us not be mistaken in the utterance of an opinion certainly involving a good deal. We have had performances of Wagner's masterpiece with certain parts as well or even better filled than by the Germans, but none with a cast so noteworthy for varied, and, as regarding the subject, appropriate excellence. The artists of last night were all "to the manner born," or, at any rate, trained in the particular school to which Wagner's opera belongs. How much this signifies we need not take the trouble to point out, while the truth of it was proved by Frau Sucher's poetic impersonation of Elsa; by the dramatic point of Frau Garso Dely's Ortrud; by Dr Kraus's artistic embodiment of Telramund; and by the grand Lohengrin of Herr Winkelmann. A better opportunity will present itself for discussing the merits of these artists, as also for doing justice to an ensemble in which every performer knew what to do, and did it well. When that time arrives, note must likewise be made of how the orchestra, conducted by Herr Hans Richter, discharged its important task. There was a large and enthusiastic audience, who re-called the chief performers again and again at the close of every act. Herr Richter's reception, we need scarcely add, was of the warmest possible character.—D. T.

LONDON GREGORIAN CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

The even-song of the tenth annual festival of this society was held in St Paul's Cathedral on Thursday, when a vast congregation joined in the service. As a prelude, trumpets gave out the opening phrase of the processional hymn, and then a thousand choristers, moving down the south aisle and up the nave to the choir, chaunted in unison the melody of "Rex sanctorum angelorum." The clear-cut notes of the ancient tune, spreading through the wide space of dome and choir, produced an excellent effect. The Rev. Mr Shuttleworth intoned the service, and, led by the cantors—Messrs Bucker and Sharp—the choir sang the appointed psalms to a Gregorian tone. In like manner the Canticles were chanted. The first lesson, appropriately selected, was read by the Rev. R. Bristow; the second by Dr Baker, head-master of the Merchant Taylors' School. The office hymn, "Ad cœnam Agni providi," preceding the anthem, was recited to a Gregorian mode. In this, as in the former tones, alternation of boys' and men's voices relieved, to some extent, the inevitable monotony, and often the mere force of numbers, expended on the limited phrases, gave thrilling effect. Nevertheless the harmony used in the anthem, "Hail! gladdening light," by the Rev. T. S. Greatheed, fell pleasantly upon the ear. As a composition, however, it is scarcely a good specimen of Anglican Church music, for the passages of imitation, often objected to in English cathedral music, are not only poor in material, but feebly worked. Many another from the long list of anthems could have been chosen of higher quality, and with nearer affinity to the character of plain song. The sermon was preached by the Right Rev. Bishop Jenner, who selected a part of the 11th verse of the 4th chapter of the 1st Epistle of St. Peter for his text. The reverend speaker earnestly pleaded the cause of, and defended the position taken by, the association. Meeting the objections raised by those who stated that the movement was calculated to impede the real progress of music, he claimed for it a higher ground than that of mere taste, and contended that Gregorian music represented the religion of the Cross, and should be regarded as are the words of Scripture. After the sermon the "Te Deum laudamus" was sung to the simple form of the Ambrosian chant. Mr Warwick Jordan was the organist for the occasion, and supported the archaic themes by accompaniments embracing harmonic combinations and florid melodies certainly unknown at the time of St Gregory. Mr Spenser Nottingham conducted the choir, which was too scattered to obey his beat with unanimity, and there were also throughout the service signs that he had not had the advantage of full and sufficient rehearsals.—P. G.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. THE NIBELUNG'S RING.

III.—Siegfried. May 9.

On the threshold of this gigantic drama's third division Siegfried, we are tempted to ask what has up to now been taught us—what great moral lesson has reached us through so complicated and elaborate an agency, and to what end have our steps been guided along ways of deceit, crime, and unutterable shame. But the question is hardly fair midway in the argument. Let us wait for the end and then put it. During the interval between The Walkyrie and Siegfried important events, which are told with customary prosiness in the dialogue, have taken place, and this is the proper moment to indicate their nature. When Sieglinde, bearing the fragments of the sword Needful, followed Brünnhilde's directions, and sought shelter in a wood near the Walkyrie rock, she encountered Mime, the whipped brother of Alberich. Mime seems to have retired from the Nibelungen business down below, and set up as a smith on his own account, though where he looked for custom in the midst of a forest does not appear. He sheltered Sieglinde, and when she died in giving birth to a son, Siegfried, he took care of the child. This sounds well, but among Wagner's characters, let us not hastily credit anybody, god, giant, or dwarf, with a generous impulse. Mime knows all about Wotan's plans, and hopes to use the Volsung hero as a means of securing the ring, tarn-cap, and treasure for himself. The precious booty is close at hand, guarded by giant Fafner in the form of a dragon. Siegfried, a brave and reckless lad, shall slay the monster, and then hey! for power, and, Alberich, look to thyself. So matters stand when we are shown Mime's smithy, and Mime himself forging another sword for young Siegfried—the lad has a habit of finding the Niebelung's weapons all too weak. As he works Siegfried bursts in with a captive bear, frightens Mime nearly to death, takes up the new sword, smashes it on the anvil, rails at his foster parent sulks with his dinner, and generally behaves like a froward, spoiled boy. He is getting beyond Mime, and begins to ask questions. "Mime, although I detest you, yet I always come back to you; why?" "Because your heart is with me." "Bah! I have seen the birds and beasts in pairs taking care of their young, where is your consort, that I may call her Mother?" "I am father and mother in one." Siegfried frankly calls Mime a liar, but pursues his catechism, and at last, by threats or violence, extracts from the Nibelung the whole story of his parentage and of the sword Needful. At once a new world opens before the youth. "Mend that steel, Mime, I'm off; this is not my home," and he runs into the forest to exult alone. The Nibelung is in despair, when the old reprobate, Wotan, enters disguised as a Wanderer. Mime is evidently to be looked after. "I have wisdom, Mime; ask three questions; I stake my head on answering them." Mime puts three questions, and the replies show that the visitor knows all about the ring and its history. Now the dwarf stakes his head, and the Wanderer interrogates. In answer, Mime reveals his acquaintance with the Volsungs and their sword; reveals also how near to his heart is the mending of the weapon. Then the departing Wanderer speaks to some purpose, "None, but who fear hath never felt maketh Needful new." Clearly, the fearful Mime is out of the game, and his despair deepens. When Siegfried returns he talks to him of fear. "What is that?" demands the unconscious hero. "Fafner the dragon will teach thee." "Then let us go, mend me my sword." Alas! Mime cannot do it. "I will," says Siegfried, and proceeds to the task in highest excitement and exaltation. "Bellows blow! brighten the glow! Needful, Needful! notable sword." As the work proceeds, Mime stands apart communing with himself. He has not given up the game. Nibelung cunning shall yet be too much for Volsung courage, and Mime will brew a drink that, after the combat, shall send the victor to sleep. Then, Needful, to Siegfried's heart, and the mighty ring for Siegfried's match. As the dwarf concocts the draught the hero finishes the sword, and the curtain falls as he holds it aloft: "Needful, Needful! notable sword! thy life again have I given. . . . Out then, and show the cowards thy sheen." In this first act Wagner's peculiar system is strikingly illustrated. Till Siegfried's exultation finds vent, there is nothing in the situation or the dialogue that calls for music, while both situation and dialogue are prolonged to the full extent of dramatic requirements without reference to the allied art. Yet every word is accompanied by the orchestra with as much elaboration as though the subject were one of lyric interest. Only the "motive" system would work here. A composer following ordinary methods would be at a loss, but to Wagner each sentence in the dialogue suggests directly or indirectly some idea for which he has a musical equivalent. Hence, at the farthest remove from the region of feeling, he is busy interweaving and connecting his representative themes. The result is ingenious, but, to most, incomprehensible, and, to very many, dull. We hear music which does not touch us, and music under these conditions is like salt which hath lost its savour. Wagner revels, of course, in Siegfried's exulting strains. Here he appeals to emotion by emotion's aid, and works, in the proper domain of art, with the intensity that in him never fails to answer provocation. No one can resist the élan of Siegfried's triumphant song. It is life and power, intensified, sublimated, carried to the highest point.

The second act shows the depths of the forest near Fafner's cave, and introduces our almost forgotten acquaintance, Alberich of the "Rhinegold." He is on the watch near the ring, and so is reprobate Wotan, whom we rejoice to hear the Nibelung salute with "Aroint, thou shameless rogue," following on with "villain" and other hard but just names. Wotan is still moving along "ways that are dark," and has come to tell Alberich of Mime's purpose to win the talisman through Siegfried's prowess. "Siegfried knows nothing; Mime knows all; look after him. Better still, warn the Dragon, perhaps he will give thee the Ring, if thou promise to protect him." Sleepy Fafner is stirred up and questioned, but takes no interest: "I lie in possession; let me slumber." Wotan thereupon goes away with the injunction, "Try Mime, he is easier beaten;" and Alberich conceals himself, calling Wotan a "light-spirited lust-gluttonous, godly enlightener." Day breaks; Mime and Siegfried enter, the first trying to inspire the second with fear. It is of no use. Siegfried laughs at his description of the Dragon, and orders the dwarf away. Seating himself under a tree, he muses about his father and mother. As he does so a singing bird draws his attention. "Would I could understand its language; it might tell me of my mother." He makes a pipe of a reed and tries to imitate the bird; fails, and resorts to his hunting horn. "So let me see whom now it will lure to make me a loving consort." The horn only awakes Fafner, who crawls out of his den. Siegfried receives him with laughter, as a "fair favoured friend," but the Dragon is not jocular. He sees a meal and opens his jaws. Out springs Needful from its sheath and drinks the monster's blood. Then Fafner, dying, generously warns his victor against Mime's contemplated treachery. Happens now a wonderful thing. In drawing Needful from Fafner's body, Siegfried stains his hands with the blood, and sucks it off. Immediately he understands bird-language, and learns from one feathered warbler the secret of the ring, the helm, and the treasure, of which cunning Mime had kept him ignorant. On this Siegfried enters the cavern, and Mime emerges from his hiding-place, followed by Alberich, the two brothers thereupon having a long squabble, which ends only when they again conceal themselves to avoid the returning hero. Siegfried bears with him the ring and tarn-helm; puts the one on his finger, ties the other to his girdle, not knowing exactly what to do with either, and listens once more to the Bird-Voice, which again says "Trust not, Mime." The smooth-tongued Nibelung approaches with honied speech and his sleeping draught; but the Volsung, thanks to the virtue of the dragon's blood, knows his real thoughts, and ends a long dialogue by striking him dead (crime the tenth—murder), while Alberich, looking on, concealed, laughs a triumphant laugh. One candidate for the Ring is no more. Weary now, Siegfried lies down, and questions the bird. He is lonely, and wants a friend. Will the bird help him? In return the Wood-Voice says, "I wot . . . a glorious wife. In guarded fastness she sleeps; fire doth emborder the spot; oversteppeth he the blaze, waked he the bride, Brynhild then would be his." This the hero understands but vaguely. A woman he knows not, has never seen; but he rises in ecstacy and follows the bird to the promised bride. As he disappears amid the forest the curtain falls. The dramatic current of this act—though checked and turned, so to speak, into back-waters by the terribly long dialogues thought needful to elucidate the story—runs often clear and strong, following always the movements of Siegfried. Around him gathers also no slight measure of poetic attraction, and the two combined go far to reconcile us to much that is extravagant and absurd enough for a modern pantomime. It must be said that Wagner handicaps his hero heavily when presenting him in association with tedious arguments and the squabblings of a set of rogues. But the hero bears the burden and wins. We watch this grand creature with ever-growing interest. Something of primeval greatness appeals to us through him, and enables us to realize an ideal of physical and emotional, if not of intellectual manhood. It is impossible to follow the details of the music, with all its elaborate interweaving of the many themes now accumulated. Enough that this act, like its predecessor, has moments when better things than ingenuity appeal to us. The whole of the forest music is attractive in its pictorial beauty and expressional force. Herr von Wolzogen tells us how it is composed; but we don't want to hear him. The themes speak with a higher significance than that arbitrarily foisted upon them by Wagner, and thus his art, as often in the work, is greater than his theory. Would that this potent master might free himself from his most mistaken apprehension of the mission dramatic music has to perform—a mission, however, which sometimes his own music discharges in spite of trammels.

In the third act we see Wotan consulting Erda, the earth goddess, as to the future that so oppresses him, and again the drama loses itself in a maze of words, from which it is ultimately gathered that, Wotan expects Brünnhilde to "work a deed for the world's release." As Erda disappears, Siegfried enters, following the bird, and Wotan bars his path with abundant talk, pouring out question after question concerning things we all know. Siegfried naturally waxes impatient: "Old inquirer, hark once for all, lead me no longer to chatter." But the god talks on, persuading the hero to turn from the danger of Brünnhilde's fire; and, when words avail not, stretching out the spear on which, he declares, Needful once brake to pieces. Needful does not break now. It falls on the god's weapon and splinters it. Already we see the advancing shadows of the night, soon to fall upon the corrupt and worthless tenants of Walhall, but Siegfried does not suspect the significance of his deed. The glow of Brünnhilde's blaze lights his eyes and warms his heart. So, yielding to the Wagnerian love for exclamations, he cries "Hoho! hoho! hahei! hahei!" and gaily wends him to the Walkyrie's rock, which now we ourselves behold, thanks to a change of scene. Brünnhilde lies as Wotan left her, save that the sun shines full on her face and flashes from her glittering shield and helmet. At sight of the apparition Siegfried, who has run through the guardian fire, stands amazed and puzzled. In growing wonder he removes the helmet and shield; yet the form is to him of a man. Next, with his sword he cuts the fastenings of the breast-plate. "This is no man! Burning enchantment charges my heart; fiery awe falls on my eyesight; my senses stagger and sway." Siegfried knows now what fear means, but strives to be calm, and nerve himself to meet the light of the strange creature's awaking eyes. He calls! no answer. He kisses her lips, and Brünnhilde sits up to hail the sun and returning life. Then begins a long scene of explanation and love. The Walkyrie knows her deliverer, and tells him how she had influenced his destiny. But the sight of her horse and arms recalls the past, so that when Siegfried advances to her she repulses him as one who brings shame to godhood. She entreats him to spare her, but the hero presses, and slowly the new womanhood asserts itself, till, passionate as he, she falls into his arms, and the curtain descends. This fine scene, though, like all the rest, unduly spun out, redeems the act, which, sooth to say, is elsewhere terribly uninteresting as well as tedious. Wagner makes no concession to human weakness. He will have his say, though the tale extend till crack of doom, and his system always allows him to go on working the orchestra through a sufficiently long string of oft-repeated motives. As is the act in its predominant dulness and welcome exception, so is Siegfried as a whole. Three scenes only impress the mind and move the feelings—in the first act, that of the sword; in the second, that of the bird; in the third, that of Brünnhilde's awakening; and with regard to each it is remarkable that the effect produced exactly corresponds to the measure in which the form and character of the music approximate to the orthodox type. Whenever there is vocal melody, continuity of theme, balance of phrase, and flowing, natural harmonies, the interest of the house awakens, the audience are placed en rapport with the stage, and a power is felt elsewhere unknown. For moments like these all must be grateful who endure others of unutterable weariness, not to say pain, and there are many such in Siegfried, unredeemed by dramatic interest, as well as by a sense of needfulness. We recognize the adage, "De gustibus," &c., of course, and possibly some may account as music the agonized and agonizing groanings and grumblings in "diminished" chords and harsh progressions of Wagner's low reeds and brass. We are not of the number. If such noises be music, then we go with Othello, who loved music "that may not be heard." As for portions of the drama, notably the scene of the Dragon, there should be no feeling but wonder at the serious revival in this our day of a Gothic absurdity fit only for children at Christmas time.

The performance had its merits and likewise its defects, the former lying chiefly in the representation of some of the leading characters. Herr Vogl, who played the hero, should especially be praised for a thoroughly artistic effort. In point of physique he did not present an ideal Siegfried, but his acting and declamation showed a most admirable conception of the character. A little more rude vigour in the sword scene would have improved its effect, but this was almost the only blot upon a performance that deserves to be remembered, and was heartily appreciated. In the difficult and repulsive part of Mime, Herr Max Schlosser did extremely well, bringing out all the low cunning of the Nibelung, and filling in the outline of the part with many happy touches, all conceived in the true spirit of Wagnerian realism. That Herr Schlosser's performance was not attractive redounded to his credit. It was splendidly unpleasant. Herr Scaria once more appeared as Wotan, with the result to be expected when a man has sustained such a character for three nights. The marvel is that Herr Scaria did not feel crushed into absolute impotence by consciousness of association with so much of the contemptible and wicked. Brünnhilde was again efficiently represented by Frau Vogl, Alberich by Herr Schelper, and Erda by Fraulein Reigler. As usual, the orchestra left much to wish for. It was often ragged and out of tune, while its want of balance materially damaged some of Wagner's choicest effects. Nevertheless, much applause followed each act, the principal artists being again and again called before the curtain.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—The second "cycle" of the Nibelung representations came to a termination on Tuesday week with Götterdämmerung, and the third began on the Friday night following with Rheingold. There have been changes in the distribution of some of the leading parts, but nothing else to call for special notice in regard to the ordinary tenor of the performances, about the peculiar claims of which to public consideration we must reserve what general observations we have to make until the experiment has been thoroughly wrought out. Meanwhile, the fact that the audiences at the second and third "cycle" have been considerably less numerous, and considerably less enthusiastic, than those attracted by the first is anything but encouraging to the bold speculators, and goes almost to convince impartial thinkers that a little of Wagner, from time to time, may be good, but that a great deal of him, within a short space of time, is apt to pall.

IT is said that M. Ambroise Thomas's Françoise de Rimini will be given in the winter at the Théâtre de la Monnaie, Brussels.

LISZT'S SYMPHONY.—DANTE'S DIVINA COMMEDIA.

It appears there are places other than heaven and earth trodden by Liszt's musical fancy. In the Dante Symphony it plunges into the infernal regions, and, listening to the howlings, ragings, cryings, and wailings, brings us an echo of the utterances of the damned. The theme was a favourite one with mediæval writers, especially so with Irish ecclesiastics, from the time of St Fursey in the seventh to Tundale in the twelfth century. The latter, whilst gazing in vision on the burning plains and listening to screams of suffering, was led to cry out in agony of soul: "Alas, Lord! what truth is there in what I have so often heard—the earth is filled with the mercy of God?" Had the old monk had the power of reproduction in music practised in the latter day by Abbè Liszt, the tempest of horrors might have proved destructive to reason; but, alas! the age of visions, like that of miracles, is past. The feeblest intellect, therefore, will get no disturbance, the frailest nerves no shock, nor the most morbid imagination any impetus to lunacy by the big-drum bogies of Liszt's orchestra. Even those whose blood used to curdle at the monsters of the pantomime, now, after becoming acquainted with the Rhinegold frights, can listen to the first movement of the symphony without fear of its madding power. It will never distress those accustomed to stage thunder. Peter Lombard, a mediæval writer, in a work called "Sentences," says—"the sight of the punishment of the condemned will not impair the glory of the blest, for although their own joys might be sufficient to the just, yet to their greater glory they will see the pains escaped." Now if no beatification is gained by sounds of woe in Liszt's vision, there is at the same time the comfort of safety from the flaming fires kindled by his genius. Were we not aware of the earnestness of the Abbé, and did we not know that the dogmas of his church teach him the solemnity of the subject, we should feel inclined to think that the composer was using his art in jest. No; we have no misgivings as to earnestness of purpose. He has, doubtless, laboured to be awe-inspiring, but unfortunately he has reached only the grotesque. In part the second—Purgatory—the composer leaves Gothic ground for regions somewhat classical. There is far more obedience to the rules of musical form, securing for it consequently the admiration that elaborate construction invariably enjoys. One of the subjects, with counter-subject, receives fugal treatment that affords pleasant contrast to the crude, disjointed fragments constituting the earlier portions of the work. The theme, given out by the strings, and afterwards taken up by the several divisions of the orchestra, fixes itself in the memory by the force of regulated science. Its meaning, however, may not be so apparent. Perhaps the subject laboured at by "strings" and "wind" may represent the stone that Sisyphus was condemned to roll in vain. But the theme lends itself to countless interpretations. It may signify anything or nothing. Who knows? it may after all be absolute music. The glories of "Paradise" find expression in the Magnificat, sung by soprano voices to the first Gregorian tone. The well-defined phrases of the primitive melody, set in an orchestral environement of considerable magnitude and elaboration, undoubtedly produce an effect that may be truly called "religioso." But it may be asked, has a Gregorian chant that supreme exaltation of character capable of embodying the ecstasy of heaven? Is there not in its accents something of a penitential nature? Has it not associations conveying a sense of sin and appeals for pardon? Burthened it may be with religious feeling without being the triumphant outburst of celestial joy. If so, the composer, despite an admirable effect, has not reached the height of his great argument. The second performance of the Symphony was given on Saturday afternoon, May 20th, at St James's Hall, under the direction of Mr. Ganz.

RICHTER CONCERTS.

Excepting two songs, admirably rendered by Frau Rosa Sucher, the fourth concert of the above series, held at St James's Hall on Monday evening, May 22nd, was devoted to the works of Beethoven and Wagner. The conductor evidently holds that the two have certain qualities in common to justify the alliance. Wagner, undoubtedly, has vigour of utterance, and general mastery over the orchestra that remind one of accents of the elder composer; nay, not only that remind, but that force a like attention, and extort something of the same kind of homage paid to the oracles of Beethoven. Here, however, relationship ceases. The spirit of reverence characterizing the elder musician is not found in the later writer. Indeed, reverence for past art, and, what is far more important, reverence for the immutable principles of morality, make the author of Fidelio take a rank far differing from that aspired to by the composer of Tannhäuser. More is the pity! For Wagner has genius capable, if rightly used, of lifting himself and his art even to the serenest heights. It seems, however, that he is content, after taking possession of his auditor, to lead him hither and thither in unseemly ways. At times there is no resisting his command over the emotions, and no one can hear the Tannhäuser overture, especially when performed as it was last Monday night, without being in some measure subdued by its fascinations. Few things in art afford more striking contrast than the themes found therein; and rarely is any subject invested with greater dynamic power than that which, plant-like, first winds its tendrils round the stately pilgrim's chant, then chokes its path with expanding foliage, and finally covers its subdued form with odour-laden blossoms. The charm and wonderous life of the subject, its versatilty of attack, and subsequent victory carry away the sympathies, and leave, at the end of the overture, the listener in a high state of excitement and pleasure. The pleasure, however, is banished if he turns to his book of words, for there he will learn, by language that offends by its baldness, that the sounds, pure in themselves as rainbow tints, are after all but hysterical screamings of passion, and will find to his dismay that what he took for honest, if fervid utterances, are but slaves to the lowest and basest part of our strangely mingled nature. With this conviction, is it any wonder then that he will cry shame to him, whoever he be, that drags down a thing of heavenly kind, to grovel in the mire of sensuality? The Siegfried Idyll imparting feelings of a very different nature, increased, by its very purity of theme, the pang of regret, that a man of such genius should have so often mistaken his way. Beethoven's Concerto in E flat, No. 5 (Op. 73), for pianoforte and orchestra was performed, Mr Oscar Berringer taking the solo part. The concert concluded with a very fine performance of the mighty master's Symphony in B flat. In all the remarkable grasp and untiring energy of the conductor, Herr Hans Richter, was conspicuous.

GERMAN OPERA AT DRURY LANE.

The order of performances at the Richter German Opera is divided into two series, thus administered:—

FIRST SERIES.—May 18, Lohengrin; 23, Tannhäuser; 25, Lohengrin; 30, Die Meistersinger; June 1, Tannhäuser; 6, Euryanthe; 8, Der Fliegende Holländer; 13, Die Meistersinger; 15, Euryanthe; 20, Tristan und Isolde; 22, Tristan und Isolde; 27, Fidelio.

SECOND SERIES.—May 20, Der Fliegende Holländer; 24, Fidelio; 27, Lohengrin; 31, Fidelio; June 3, Die Meistersinger; 7, Tannhäuser; 10, Euryanthe; 14, Tannhäuser; 17, Lohengrin; 21, Der Fliegende Holländer; 24, Tristan und Isolde; 28, Die Meistersinger.

So that they, as it were, intertwine. The idea is original and happy. Subscribers can choose between the two series, or grasp both with either hand, and without, moreover, quitting the city. Bravo! Mr Franke.

WAGNER AND "PARSIFAL."—An audience exclusively composed of known partizans of Wagner and his theories had been invited to attend the final grand rehearsal of Parsifal at the forthcoming celebration in Bayreuth. His Majesty of Bavaria, however, having intimated his desire to be present, the arrangements were necessarily altered, and that august monarch, in accordance with a favourite custom of recent years, will be the sole spectator. Those amateurs who intend going to Bayreuth with the object of hearing Parsifal may be glad to know that a pianoforte arrangement of the score, accompanied by the verbal text, has been published by the enterprising firm of Schott, at Mayence. An English translation, moreover, "in exact accordance with the original," from the united pens of H. L. and F. Corder, has been printed; and this will be of considerable use to a large number of foreign critics, who, as in the instance of Ring des Nibelungen, six years ago, being wholly unversed in the new Eleusinian Mysteries, found themselves more or less puzzled. Visitors to Bayreuth should go fully equipped for the occasion; and it is to be hoped that Herr Hans von Wolzogen will prepare a "Guide" for Parsifal, as he did for the Ring; so that the "leitmotives" may at once be detected and committed to memory. An English translation by Herr Ernst von Wolzogen, as clear and intelligible as that of the "Nibelung Guide," now in every one's hands, Wagnerian or non-Wagnerian, would also be an invaluable help. Wagner's recent works are not to be grasped without adequate preliminary study, and no such aids should be disregarded. It is stated in some German papers, that immediately after the representations of Parsifal the poet-composer will leave Bayreuth for Venice. Nothing since has been circulated about the visit to Athens, or the projected Greek opera. Let us hope, nevertheless, that the idea has not altogether been abandoned. "C. A. B." will, peraunter, instruct us on this matter.—D. T.

A Jewish Synagogue Melody.

Dr Wind.—Eagles, I have stayed out my welcome.

Dr Eagles.—How, Wind?

Dr Wind—You have two heads—one pro, t'other con. With the pro all right; with the con all wrong.

Dr Eagles.—Fudge!

Dr Wind.—I am aware that Dr Brandies is expected at the Eyrie, and I know that he also has two heads—one pro, t'other con. I detest the con, but tolerate the pro———

Dr Eagles.—Brandies is only coming to tea.

Dr Wind.—Besides, Mrs Eagles and the young Eaglets wish me a long way off. So, though I have given them bushels of plover's eggs, they want change. I can't, and wouldn't if I could, give phenicopters upon whom depend transmission and remission.

Dr Eagles.—Pheniocpters have not been in sight of the Eyrie for seven months———

Dr Wind.—Because they are afraid of Mrs Eagles, who wants to nourish her progeny on their bones and feathers; and you are aware that they are fleshless, &c., being merely the heads and beaks of defunct phœnixes. Moreover, I am waiting for news about an Ebrew melody, which———

(Phenicopter appears with envelope in beak.)

Dr Eagles.—Here's phenicopter!

Young Eaglets (to Mrs Eagles).—Oh! mama—let us have phenicopter for supper! Ask papa catch him.

Dr Eagles.—What say you, Wind?

Dr Wind (promptly).—By no means. My phenicopters signify transmission and remission, and I can't dispense with either. (Takes envelope from beak of phenicopter, and blows it open.) By Jove! Here's an Ebrew tune, fresh from Synagogne.

Dr Eagles.—Hum it.

Dr Wind (singing tempestuously):—

Dr Eagles.—Your voice is as the voice of one howling in the wilderness, without locusts or wild honey. Sing again.

Dr Wind.—Here is a postscriptum from Charles Kensington Salaman, who says that Rossini stole this from the Synagogue, and used it twice—once for the Willow Song in Otello, and once for the Prayer at the end of Moses in Egypt.

Dr Eagles (Comic head).—Then I must say that in both instances Rossini has much improved it.

Dr Eagles (Grave head).—I must say that in both instances Rossini has utterly spoiled it.

Dr Wind.—No matter, I must go to Salaman for information.

Young Eaglets.—Mama! Papa! Phenicopter pie, please — or else Dr Wind.

Dr. Eagles.—Wind, you must leave your phenicopter, or they will take you too and make pie of both. They are hungry.

Dr Wind.—Fiddlestick. Here (blows eyrie, Dr Eagles, Mrs Eagles and eaglets into the valley a thousand feet below, and, catching the skirt of Boreas on his way to London, forms part of the whirlwind, from which, freeing himself with considerable dexterity, he alights at the house of Charles Kensington Salaman, who, putting aside Wagner's "Judaism in Music," which he had been sedulously perusing, welcomes his deliverer with open arms).

C. K. S.—Glad to see you, old friend! How's Mrs Wind?

The next concert of chamber music is announced to take place in the Academy on Saturday evening, June 10.

Bayreuth.—The statement which has appeared concerning the grand rehearsal of Parsifal is thus corrected by Wagner himself:—"People are mistaken. The King of Bavaria does not wish to attend any rehearsal at which I reserve the right of making alterations; this is the reason why—if only from a feeling of proper consideration for the artists—I have resolved to admit no one to the so-called general rehearsal (which has degenerated into an abuse)."

Constantinople.—Dubez, harpist, from Vienna, gave a concert in the Theatre of the Municipal Garden, Pera, which was numerously attended. The Austro-Hungarian Ambassador, Baron Calice, and his wife, the Baroness, were among the audience. Dubez performed on the harp, the guitar, the concertina, and the cithern. He played, also, at the Austro-Hungarian Embassy for a charity, and before the Sultan at the Palace, who listened for two hours, and was so pleased that he immediately conferred on the artist the Medije Order, Fourth Class.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

It may be doubted whether the frequenters of operahouses greatly care now to witness Il Trovatore, but there is no question at all that, when Mdme Adelina Patti appears in Verdi's work—so dear to street organs—the proverbial contempt which too much familiarity breeds is overborne by a sentiment of personal admiration. The aspect of Covent Garden Theatre on Tuesday night proved this; a large and fashionable audience listening to the well-known strains with a placidity bespeaking something more than patience. By the way, the character of that audience was contradictory. We have referred to it as placid, and, as a matter of fact, its enjoyment may have been deep, but was certainly not loud. Yet at times during the evening floral tributes rained upon the stage in numbers sufficient to indicate the wildest enthusiasm. The effect was curious—something like that of a man whose face suggests a roar of laughter, while he utters no sound. How Mdme Patti acquitted herself of a familiar task need scarcely be said. Her impersonations vary as little as do her vocal powers, and not more than the success she obtains. The old story has to be told over again about Leonora of Tuesday night—finished singing, refined, if not profoundly sympathetic, acting, and a pervading atmosphere of prima-donna worship. The Azucena was Mdlle Stahl, who had in that character something better suited to her powers than the light comedy part of Federico (Mignon). She played the gipsy in the broad and effective style which distinguished her performance as Amneris; gaining the full approval of discerning amateurs. Unfortunately her singing in "Stride la vampa" was a little out of tune, and the fact had a depressing influence, not removed by subsequent good work. Mdlle Stahl is, however, so capable an artist that her ultimate position amongst us cannot fail to gratify her desire. Concerning the Manrico of Signor Nicolini we need say no more than that it was the Manrico of previous seasons, while his singing exhibited the special qualities that have often provoked comment. As time goes on Signor Nicolini can less and less be heard with indifference. Few artists make their audience more conscious of the fact that a vocalist appeals to the feelings. Mr Devries was a fairly good representative of the wicked Count, and he gained an encore for "Il Balen," despite a suspicion of throatiness and a pronounced vibrato. The band and chorus were as perfect in their work as it was natural to expect, and Signor Bevignani conducted skilfully.

(Correspondence.)

The Ring Theatre trial has ended in severe sentences against Inspector Geringer and Superintendent Nitsche, the former being condemned to four, the latter to eight months' hard labour, with one day's fasting per week. Jauner is to be imprisoned, without hard labour, for four months. The three prisoners will, moreover, have to pay six thousand and eighty-seven florins to the sufferers and their relatives. There are, in addition, other compensation claims which, before settlement, will be investigated by the Court.

In consequence of the unsatisfactory financial results of previous experiments there will be no Italian opera this year at Vienna.

LONDON BALLAD CONCERTS.

The first of two morning Ballad Concerts announced by Mr John Boosey took place at St James's Hall on Saturday, May 13, before a large audience. Several of the favourite singers of the London Ballad Concerts took part in the one under notice, including Mdmes Lemmens-Sherrington, Isabel Fassett, Antoinette Sterling, and Miss Santley; Messrs Santley, Joseph Maas, and Maybrick, as well as the South London Choral Society, under the direction of Mr L. C. Venables. The usual enthusiasm was expressed by the audience after several of the most popular ballads had been sung, notably for "Quando a te lieta" (Mdme Sterling), from Gounod's Faust, and the same composer's "Nazareth" (Mr Santley), as well as for Mr F. H. Cowen's "Never again" (Mdme Sterling) and "Father O'Flynn" (Mr Santley), all of which had to be repeated. Miss Santley's expressive singing of "Wapping Old Stairs" and "O, that we two were Maying" (Gounod), met with warm approval, and Mdme Sherrington pleased immensely in "Quand tu chantes." Mr Maybrick was at his best in Stephen Adams' "Midshipmite," and Mr Joseph Maas was "called" twice after Balfe's "Come into the garden, Maud." A feature in the programme was Beethoven's Romanza in F for the violin, which Mdme Néruda played in perfection. The second and last morning concert is announced for Wednesday next, May 27, when the compositions of Mr Arthur Sullivan will occupy the first part of the programme, interpreted by Misses Mary Davies, Clara Samuel, Eleanor Farnol, and Mdme Antoinette Sterling; Messrs Edward Lloyd, Barrington Foote, and Charles Santley. Mdme Norman Néruda will again appear, and Mdme Sophie Menter will make her first appearance at these concerts, where no doubt her exceptional talent will find ardent admirers. Mr Sidney Naylor, who undertook the arduous duties of accompanist at the first concert, will occupy his accustomed post.

TURIN.—Baron Jocteau's new opera, Masina Spinola, just produced at the Teatro Vittorio Emmanuele, was in most instances so badly performed, that hisses and laughter completely drowned all friendly applause.

AIX-LA-CHAPELLE.—As usual, the annual concert given by Herr Breuning was, this year also, highly successful. The programme included works by Mozart, Haydn, A. Rubinstein, and F. Liszt. To these names must be added that of Herr Tivadar Nachèz, from London, who contributed five original pieces for the violin, all of which, together with Ernst's concerto in F sharp minor, he played in a way that afforded unalloyed satisfaction, and was rewarded by loud and frequent applause. In fact, as the Aachener Zeitung says: "The real hero of the evening was the violin virtuoso, Tivadar Nachèz."

BOULOGNE-SUR-MER (from a Correspondent).—Peccavi I sing! In my last letter to the Musical World I wrote that there would be no more concerts this season by the Société Philharmonique; but, to my surprise, and to the pleasure of a numerous audience, at the Etablissement, on Monday night (May 22), a third concert was given. The pieces selected were mostly instrumental, but varied by Mdlle Scharwenka, who interpreted with facility and taste the "Canzonetta du 17me qualuor (Haydn). Some "Variations," by Proch, and a song in place of the "Valse de l'ombre," from the Pardon de Ploërmel, announced in the programme. The Membres de la Société sang with effect "L'Introduction et Barcarolle d'Obéron," arranged by Gounod, and "Les marins aux Tropiques" (J. d'Aoust), at the end of each part of the programme. M. Breitner delighted his audience by his execution of a Fantasia, by Schubert (orchestrée par Liszt), a Gavotte, by Raff, a "Romance," by Rubinstein, an "Etude," by Chopin, and "Marche Turque," by Beethoven. M. Vivien, son of the well-known violinist, a thoroughly good violinist himself, also charmed us by his performance of Vieuxtemps' Concerto, in E major, and a grand "Fantaisie militaire," by Léonard, each time accompanied by the orchestra.—X. WAGNER'S PARSIFAL.

RICHARD WAGNER has replied to the statement published by the German papers in somewhat petulant terms. "People"—he says, among other things—"are wholly mistaken. The King of Bavaria expresses no desire to attend any rehearsal at which I claim the privilege of making alterations; and for this reason, if only out of consideration for the artists, I am determined to admit no one, under any pretext, to the so-called 'general rehearsal'—which has long since degenerated into a general abuse." The protest is of excellent flavour; but, as regards monarchical claims, a mere flare of self-asserting independence. From the time of Mozart, when Emperors, Kings, &c., were more or less despotic, till the actual period, when, happily, despotism is an exception, the "general rehearsal" has frequently been attended by the Court, not seldom in preference to the first public representation. Fancy Mozart keeping out the Emperor Leopold II. from any rehearsal of his Serayljo or Figaro! Still less likely is it that Wagner, at the final probationary trial of his Parsifal, would deny admission to the King of Bavaria, who is said to be responsible for whatever may be the deficit—a deficit—seeing that by no means the same amount of curiosity which, in 1876, brought people from every country to witness the Ring des Nibelungen is evinced—may possibly be considerable. The Ring itself did not "pay," as is tolerably well known, although it is notorious that the King of Bavaria, who was largely responsible, gave explicit orders that any one desirous of witnessing the "general rehearsal" might do so for the consideration of twenty marks, and that a large number of visitors to Bayreuth availed themselves of the privilege. Nevertheless, even with this "leg up," the "Stage-Play Festival" was, in language equally symbolical, "tail down"—that is to say, a disastrous pecuniary failure. Only the hotel-keepers, lodging-house keepers, car-proprietors, music-publishers, and tradespeople in ordinary—not one out of fifty of whom purchased a ticket to witness the agonizing throes of the somniferous Wotan—made any profit out of the undertaking, they themselves being simply undertakers in another sense. Be assured that His Franconian Majesty, upon whom Wagner has exercised as potent an influence as Lola Montez (also an acute politician) on his Royal predecessor, will be present at the final rehearsal ("general," be it, if that suits better) of Parsifal: and that he will be there as sole spectator from the front. I envy him the privilege—for whatever may be said, or thought, about the music, the poem is a great poem, and the poet—as Shelley says of Coleridge (a far inferior poet to Wagner)—

———— "a mighty poet,
With subtle-soul'd psychology."

I should like to embrace Wagner the poet, and cuff Wagner the musician. Why, because he is a poet in the skies, should he be so anxious to thrust music into a bog? Why can he not be thankful for the gift that comes to him from above? Why should he wish to destroy—utterly destroy—an art with which he has as little real sympathy as he has vast sympathy with another, in which he surpasses most men of our time?

THE MENDELSSOHN FAMILY.*

Astonishment has often been expressed that the children and grandchildren of Moses Mendelssohn should have been induced to renounce the ancient religion of their race, which their illustrious father and grandfather upheld and defended with such consistent zeal, constancy, and erudition. I apprehend that astonishment will cease when the following facts are made more generally known, and considered in all their bearings by the world at large. By an edict of Frederick the Great, dated 1752, that despotic monarch limited the number of Jews whom he would permit to reside in Berlin, and ordered that the exclusive privilege should be purchased. A Prussian Jew was obliged to pay for permission to marry; he had also to pay a tax upon every child; and if the number of Jews in the Prussian capital exceeded the limit fixed by the King's edict, the surplus was forced to quit the country. Prussian-born Jews were not allowed to enter the army, nor to become agriculturists, nor manufacturers, nor to pursue liberal professions. They were only privileged to study medicine and mathematics. A Jew who was not born at Berlin could not obtain permission to reside there, unless he were in the service of one of his privileged co-religionists. Moses Mendelssohn, a native of Dessau, was tolerated at the capital, in the capacity of shopman to Bernhard, his co-religionist. He was indebted to a Frenchman for the privilege of residing freely at Berlin. The Marquis D'Argens addressed a petition to Frederick in favour of Mendelssohn, to whom the King was partial. The memorial was in the following terms :—"A bad Catholic philosopher entreats a bad Protestant philosopher to grant the privilege to a bad Jewish philosopher."† The King, perhaps amused at the oddness of the appeal, granted to Mendelssohn the permission asked for; but which, it was understood, was not to be extended to his descendants; and for this grant a thousand thalers were demanded. This tax was, however, remitted.

The foregoing statement would appear to be almost incredible but for the exhibition of narrow-minded illiberality and antagonism to Jewish interests of which the modern German Anti-Semites have lately given the world a too infamous experience. It would account for the descendants of Moses Mendelssohn having abandoned Judaism and professed Christianity; and not only the members of that gifted family, but such eminent artists as Heine, Woelfl, Ferdinand Ries, Kalkbrenner, Moscheles, Ferdinand Hiller, Joachim, Rubinstein, and numberless other distinguished German, Polish, Hungarian, and Russian Jewish musicians, poets, painters, literati, and scientists, who, finding that the religion of their fathers would interfere with the free exercise of their professional career, renounced its practice, and adopted the dominant religion of their native country which at once removed every obstruction, and restriction, and religious prejudice from which they might otherwise have suffered. The eminent genius and illustrious philosopher of Germany, merely tolerated as the "shopman" of a Berlin merchant, was

"Moses Mendelssohn,
The greatest sage since Socrates, his own nation's glory, any nation's ornament, the confidant of Lessing and of Truth.
He died, as he lived, serene and wise."‡ or, according to Professor Rammler's monumental inscription:—

"Moses Mendelssohn,

The Jew, who, by his external appearance, by his speech, and most of all by his singing, is incapable of manifesting himself artistically, has, nevertheless, been at length able to exercise supreme sway over public taste in the most widely spread of any kind of modern art, namely, music. Let us, in order to explain this phenomenon, first consider how the Jew managed to become a musician.

From the turn in our social development, when money began, with more and more openly avowed recognition, to be raised to the real source of nobility and power, it was impossible to deny the Jews, to whom the system of making money without work properly so-called, that is to say, usury, was the only trade permitted, the patent of nobility in modern and needy society; but they achieved this themselves. Our modern education, attainable only by persons in easy circumstances, was the less closed against them, as it had sunk down to be a purchasable article of luxury. From this period, consequently, we beheld in our society the educated Jew, the difference between whom and the uneducated, common Jew, we have to consider attentively. The educated Jew has made the most energetic efforts to divest himself of all the striking marks characterizing his more humble co-religionists; in many cases he has even deemed it expedient to endeavour to efface by means of Christian baptism all traces of his origin. But this zeal has never enabled him to win the desired fruits of his exertions; it has resulted simply in completely isolating and rendering him the most heartless of men, to such an extent, indeed, that we cannot help losing even our former sympathy for the tragic fate of his race. In place of the bonds which he arrogantly snapt in twain, uniting him with his previous brothers in misfortune, it was impossible for him to find a new one connecting him with the society to which he had raised himself. He is connected only with those persons who require his money; but never has money been able to form between men a bond that was blessed in its results. A stranger, taking no interest in anything, the educated Jew stands in the midst of a society which he does not understand; with the partialities and efforts of which he does not sympathize; and the history and development of which have been matters of indifference to him. In such a position, we have seen thinkers rise up among the Jews; the thinker is a poet who looks backwards; the true poet, however, is the pre-announcing prophet. For the office of such a prophet a man is rendered capable only by the profoundest sympathy, full of soul, with a great community of similar aspirations, the unconscious utterance of which the poet interprets according to its purport. Completely excluded, in consequence of his position, from this community, and completely and violently severed from connection with his own race, the more gentlemanly Jew found that the education he had acquired, and paid for, could serve only as an article of luxury, as he really did not know what to do with it. One portion of his education consisted, however, of our modern arts, and among them of that art which may be learnt more easily than any other, namely, music, and, moreover, that music which, separated from the sister arts, had, by the impulse and the power of the greatest geniuses, been raised to the height of the most general power of expression, a height at which it could either, in new connection with the other arts, express the most elevated things, or, if still kept separated from them, the most indifferent and most trivial. What the educated Jew, in his position as described, had to express, when he wished to manifest himself artistically, could naturally be only something indifferent and trivial, since his entire feeling for art was simply a matter of luxury, and not a necessity. According as he was prompted by his humour, or by some interest lying beyond the pale of art, he could express himself in one manner or the other; but he never felt the impulse to say anything decided, necessary, and real; he merely wished to speak, no matter what he might say, and consequently the How was the only important consideration with him. Now, no art affords a person such ample opportunities for speaking in it without really saying anything as music, because in music the greatest geniuses have already said whatever was to be said in it as an absolutely separate art. When this had once been uttered, those who came afterwards could only gabble it imitatively—gabble it with painful exactness and wonderful similarity, just as parrots jabber human words and conversation, but also without expression or human feeling, again just like these stupid birds. There is, however, an especial peculiarity observable in this ape-like and imitative language of our Jewish manufacturers of music, namely, the peculiarity of the Jewish manner of speaking generally, as already minutely described by us.

The peculiarities of this Jewish mode of talking and of singing, in its most glaring singularity, characterize more especially the common Jew, the educated Jew having made the most unheard-of efforts to divest himself of them, but they stick to him, with impertinent stubbornness, despite all he can do. Though this misfortune may be explicable on purely physiological grounds, we find also a cause for it in the social position, on which we have touched, occupied by the educated Jew. All our luxurious art may, it is true, float almost entirely in the air of our arbitrary fancy, but a fibre connecting it with the natural, firm ground, the spirit of the people, holds it fast from below. The true poet, no matter in what department of art he produces his poetic work, always derives his inspiration only from the truthful and affectionate contemplation of spontaneous life, such as meets his gaze among the people alone. Where, now, does the educated Jew find such a people? If he has any connection at all with this kind of society, it is exclusively with some excrescence, entirely severed from the real and healthy stock; his connection with it is, however, completely devoid of affection, and the absence of that feeling must always be more apparent to him when, in order to obtain sustenance for his process of artistic creation, he descends to the bottom of this society; not only will everything there be stranger and more unintelligible to him, but the involuntary antipathy of the people towards him appears in its most insulting nakedness, because it is not, as among the richer classes, weakened or broken by any calculation of profit or consideration of certain common interests. Repelled, in the most offensive manner, from contact with this people, or, at any rate, perfectly incompetent to seize the spirit animating them, the educated Jew finds himself driven to the roots of his own stock, where, at least, he can undoubtedly understand things much better. Whether he wishes it or no, it is from this source that he is obliged to draw; but it is only a How, and not a What, that he has to gain from it. The Jew has never possessed an art of his own, and, therefore, his life has never been a life capable of an artistic purport; even now, a universally valid human purport is not to be obtained from it by the seeker, but only a peculiar mode of expression, and, moreover, the very mode of expression which we have already described. Now, for the Jewish composer the only musical utterance of his people is the musical worship of his Jehovah; the synagogue is the sole source from which he can derive national motives, intelligible to him, for his art. The more noble and sublime we may feel disposed to imagine this musical service was in its primitive purity, the more decidedly must we perceive that this purity was most offensively obscured, before it reached us; in this instance, nothing has been further developed, for thousands of years, from out the abundance of inward life, but everything has remained, as in Judaism generally, stiff and motionless. A form, however, which is never animated by a renewal of its purport, perishes; an expression, of which the purport has long ceased to be living feeling, becomes senseless and distorted. Who has not had an opportunity of convincing himself of the grimace-like absurdity characterizing the religious music in a regular people's synagogue? Who has not been seized with a sensation of the greatest repugnance, mixed with one of horror and of ridiculousness, on hearing that guttural, shrill, gabbling noise, which no intentional caricature can convey, as it is performed in perfect, ingenious earnest? Recently, it is true, the spirit of reform has proved itself active in this music as well as other things, by an attempt to restore its old purity; but what was done by higher, reflecting Jewish intelligence is only, by its nature, a fruitless attempt, from upwards, which can never take root beneath to such an extent that for the educated Jew, who, for the requirements of his art, seeks the true source of vitality among the people, the mirror of his intelligent efforts shall be presented to him as this source. He seeks the Involuntary and not the Reflective, which latter is precisely what his product is; and, as this spontaneous element, he obtains only the distorted expression of which we have spoken.

If this return to the people, as his source, is, on the part of the educated Jew, as on that of every artist generally, involuntary, and, from the nature of the case, imperatively commanded by unconscious necessity, the impression received here, also, is communicated quite as involuntary, and, therefore, with invincible supremacy, to his whole mode of viewing everything and to his productions in the way of art. The melismata and rhythms peculiar to the music of the synagogue engross his musical fancy exactly as involuntary familiarity with the melodies and the rhythms of our national songs and of our national dances constituted the real fashioning power of those who created our artistic music, vocal and instrumental. In the wide range of what is national and artistic in our music, the perceptive faculty of the educated Jew can grasp only that which appeals to him generally as intelligible; but intelligible, that is to say, so intelligible that he can apply it to his artistic purposes, is only that which, in some approximate degree, resembles the peculiarity of Jewish music. If, when studying our naïve, as well as our consciously fashioning musical system, the Jew endeavoured to discover its heart, and its vital nerves, he would necessarily become aware that not the slightest part of it really resembles his musical nature, and the pefectly foreign character of the whole would inevitably so affright him, that he could not possibly retain courage to co-operate in our process of artistic creation. But there is nothing in his position to us which induces the Jew to penetrate thus deeply into our nature; either intentionally (directly he understands his position towards us), or involuntarily (if he cannot understand us at all), he observes our artistic system and its life-giving inward organism only in a completely superficial manner, and, thanks simply to this apathetic system of observation on his part, external points of resemblance with what alone is intelligible to his way of looking at things, and to his peculiar nature, may strike him. For him, therefore, the most pleasing outwardness of the phenomena in the domain of our musical life and of our art, must possess the value of their inward essence, and the sensations he derives from them must, when as an artist he reproduces those sensations, appear to us strange, cold, singular, indifferent, unnatural and distorted, so that Jewish musical works often produce upon us the same effect as, for instance, a poem by Goethe would produce, if recited to us in the Jewish jargon.

Just as, in this jargon, words and constructions are jumbled together, with a wonderful absence of all expression, the different forms and styles of all masters and times are mixed up by Jewish musicians. We find in their productions, piled up, close to each other, in the most confused chaos, the peculiarities of form belonging to every school. As the object in all such productions is merely to say something, regardless of the fact whether the thing itself is worth saying, such twaddle can only be rendered in any way exciting to the ear, through offering by a change, every moment, in the outward mode of expression, a new incentive to attention. Inward excitement, real passion, finds its language at the instant that, struggling to be understood, it resolves to speak; the Jew, whose character in this respect has already been minutely described by us, feels no true passion, least of all, passion impelling him, out of itself, to artistic productivity. Where, however, no such passion exists, there is no repose to be found; true, noble repose is nothing but passion appeased by resignation. Where repose has not been preceded by passion, we acknowledge only slothfulness; now the opposite of slothfulness is that feverish restlessness, which we perceive, from beginning to end, in Jewish musical works, except where it makes room for the slothfulness of ideas and of feeling, such as we have described. What, therefore, results from the determination of the Jew to produce anything in the way of art must necessarily possess inherently the quality of coldness, and of indifference amounting to triviality and ridiculousness, and we must designate historically the period of Judaism in modern music as the period of complete unproductivity and of decaying stability.

BALFE.

The subjoined letter, addressed on the 4th inst. by a number of influential and distinguished musicians (whose names are appended) to the Dean of Westminster, was followed by the happiest result. A tablet to our popular composer is at last to be placed in a fitting position in Westminster, thanks to the Dean, who seems to be following in the footsteps of his eminent predecessor, Dean Stanley.

May 4th, 1882.

Very Reverend Sir,—We, whose names are appended hereto, desire to add our testimony to the claim of Michael William Balfe as a representative national composer; and to express our earnest hope that you will accede to the request to allow a tablet to be placed in Westminster Abbey, to the memory of a musician, whose genius and achievements won for him, during his lifetime, a high reputation, not only among his countrymen, but also upon the Continent of Europe.

To the Very Rev. the Dean of Westminster.

Mr Maurice Strakosch has left London for Paris.

Verdi and his wife have returned from Paris to Brussels.

Sig. Tagliafico's friends—and their name is legion—will be pleased to hear he is completely restored to health.

Mr Sims Reeves has gone for a short time to one of the German Baths. Health attend him.

Annette Essipoff-Leschetizky, the fairy pianist, played a short time since before the Czar at Gatschina. The King of Roumania has bestowed on her the large Gold Medal for Merit (First Class).

Mdme Montigny Rémaury, Queen of French pianists, will shortly arrive in London. She is to play at Mr Ganz's next concert (June 3rd) the first concerto (in C) of Beethoven—a masterpiece of the old eternal pattern, by far too seldom heard in public. For this, all true musical amateurs owe her thanks.

Valleria's Filina.—In Mdme Valleria Filina has again had a most competent representative. The part is played by no one with a truer perception of the spirit of comedy, or with more careful elaboration of detail. In this respect Mdme Valleria's assumption gave real pleasure to those who noted it carefully; while her singing, which was at its best in the Titania air, called forth repeated signs of approval.—Daily Telegraph.

Lyons.—The Municipal Council have released Campocasso, manager of the municipal theatres, from the agreement which bound him to the town for three years. They have also resolved to suppress the subvention and to put the Grand Théâtre and the Célestins up to public competition. "The grant made to Campocasso, which was not sufficient to establish a proper balance in his accounts," says a writer in the Gaulois, "was 200,000 francs; its suppression, in every respect deplorable, renders opera henceforth impossible in the second city of France."

CONCERTS.

Sig. Sgambati.—The fifth concert of the Philharmonic Society brought forward Signor Sgambati from Rome, a pianist and composer of remarkable ability, of whom his countrymen are, and have reason to be, proud. Signor Sgambati has hitherto, we believe, given almost exclusive attention to instrumental music for the orchestra and the chamber, in each department winning distinction. The composition which introduced him to an English audience on the present occasion was a concerto in G minor for pianoforte and orchestra, his fifteenth public work, and one in every respect meriting high consideration. With much independent thought and originality of treatment, there is little in the concerto to justify an assertion put forth in the "analytical programme"—that Signor Sgambati is "a disciple of the modern school." On the contrary—as the writer feels compelled to add—"in the matter of form he adheres to classical models." The one assertion contradicts the other, inasmuch as what especially distinguishes the "advanced" school is contempt for that "form," venerated by the truly great masters, in the absence of which all artistic result must turn out, in a greater or lesser degree, chaotic. That Signor Sgambati can shape his ideas with logical consistency, and yet be here and there discursive, just as fancy may dictate, is shown in the "moderato maestoso" which opens the concerto; that he can be melodious and expressive, while at the same time happy in the use of ornate devices, is equally proved by the succeeding movement, a graceful romanza in the key of E flat. The finale, "allegro animato," framed after the "rondo"-pattern (ignored by "higher development," but enduring all the same), is built upon a catching theme, and being developed with unflagging spirit, brings the whole to an effective conclusion. As a pianist, though he studied for some time under Liszt, Signor Sgambati exhibits none of the peculiarities of those who most delight to figure as chosen apostles of that unique phenomenon. There is no hint of extravagance in his playing. Thanks to his perfect technique, when mastering difficulties with consummate ease he does so with such quiet composure as materially to enhance the charm of his performance. In fact, he cultivates the pure legitimate style with which self display and obtrusive mannerism have nothing whatever in common. As such he was doubly welcome, and the unanimous applause he obtained, a just tribute to his merits, showed how thoroughly he had been appreciated.—Graphic.

Mr Ganz's Orchestral Concerts.—The chief feature in the programme of Mr. Ganz's third concert, as in that of the first, was Liszt's "Symphonic poem" founded on Dante's Divina Commedia. Why the work was repeated does not seem very clear. Official announcements referred to the interest excited at its previous hearing, but there is just a chance that Mr Ganz reckoned upon the curiosity which description and criticism could hardly have failed in awakening. The feeling satisfied, we cannot suppose that this musical Divina Commedia will often vex the atmosphere of our concert rooms, unless, indeed, it be shorn of the "Inferno." Liszt's "Purgatory" is endurable, and his "Paradise" not without attractions; but a place in the abode of the blessed affords no adequate recompense for the horrors to be endured on the way thither. How earnestly a certain school of modern composers are striving to make music synonymous with suffering! Either they ingeniously twist it into a tangle, unravelled only by pains, or they distort it into a simulacrum of things horrible and ugly. The fault is certainly not theirs if concert-going remains outside the category of penal processes. Eventually they may secure for it a place therein; and then, should an "age of faith" return, there will be at hand a formidable means of mortifying the flesh. The overtures to Oberon and Tannhäuser were associated with the "symphonic poem" on Saturday afternoon, a perfect glut of romantic music being the consequence. But the programme could not fairly be called monotonous, some interesting songs, well sung by Miss Carlotta Elliot, affording variety, as did to a greater extent and in a more decided way, the performance of Chopin's pianoforte concerto in F minor by M. Vladimir de Pachmann, an artist who then made his début in England. M. de Pachmann comes, we believe, from Russia, but has lately been playing in Paris with marked success. It may, therefore, be assumed that his powers are of no ordinary kind. The connoisseurs of Paris affect a decidedly exigent attitude towards candidates for their suffrages, and if M. de Pachmann has pleased them he is entitled to have the fact scored in his favour. His choice of Chopin's work indicated the particular school of pianoforte music with which he is most associated; but we are not sure that the selection was in all respects a wise one. The Polish composer could write for his own instrument in a way unique and unapproachable, but he knew little of the orchestra, and his concertos are heavily weighted by the feebleness with which he has treated it. For a début, therefore, Chopin in his orchestral form should be declined in favour of some master whose music is all a help and in no sense a hindrance to the artist. M. de Pachmann achieved, nevertheless, a success which must have been highly gratifying. He played with taste and facility, and at once gained the favour of his audience, whose applause was not stinted. Doubtless we shall soon hear the newcomer in a classic work of higher rank than Chopin's. Then will be the time for a more definite estimate of powers which are unquestionably great. Perhaps M. de Pachmann will follow the fashion, and give a "recital." If so, he may reckon upon a sympathetic hearing.—D. T.

Mr W. Henry Thomas gave his annual concert at the Athenæum, Camden Road, on Tuesday evening, May 23. To entertain his friends and patrons he secured the services of eminent artists, who faithfully carried out a programme of interest and merit. Miss Santley, hitherto known chiefly as the daughter of one of our greatest vocal and dramatic artists, needs no longer the help of a renowned name, for her pure voice, sound musicianship and engaging manners, are fast securing her a good reputation. In Sullivan's "Lullaby," and Roeckel's new song, "Lord Mayor Whittington," she displayed the qualities of an artist. Her esteemed father, Mr Santley, received an ovation, on his appearance on the platform, only accorded to singers in the highest favour of the public. That he fully deserved the favour he proved by most admirable and characteristic singing. Miss Margaret Hoare had previously achieved success in concerts given in the north of London, and certainly the good voice and refined style she manifested in Schubert's "Ave Maria," and Bishop's "Bid me discourse," will do much to increase the hearty appreciation hitherto accorded. Mr Henry Piercy, a young tenor, rich in tone, and manly in expression, made a very favourable impression. Miss Price, a young singer from the Principality showed that Wales still sent forth sweet singers, by her warbling in the quaint ditty, "The Bells of Aberdovey." Of Miss Orridge it is sufficient to state that she again confirmed the high opinion of her hearers, who insisted upon her acceding to an encore for Bishop's aria, "By the simplicity of Venus' Doves." Mr Lewis Thomas was also deservedly encored in "Non più andrai." The instrumental part of the concert did not by any means suffer eclipse through the vocal; for the class of music played by M. Marcel Herwegh and Mr W. Henry Thomas, was, in itself, of a high character. The "Duo pour piano et violon" (Goldmark); the solo violin "Andante et finale du concerto" (Mendelssohn); the pianoforte solos, "Minuetto grazioso" (Glück); "Waltz in A flat" (Chopin); with the "Romance and Scherzo" for violin (Franz Ries), afforded ample scope for the abilities of the artists. And an artist M. Marcel Herwegh assuredly is, for all he did proclaimed him such. He has an exquisite tone, brilliant execution, with a nervous sensibility that imparts vitality to every phrase. His success was great. The concert-giver, Mr W. Henry Thomas, is happily too well known and appreciated to need now more than a passing mention of his warm reception by a crowded house,—D. E.

Mr Sinclair Dunn, R.A.M., has brought to a close a series of six chamber concerts, at the London Art Galleries, Baker Street, at which it may fairly be said he has won fresh laurels. Commencing with the "Auld Scotch Sangs" of Burns, Hogg, Glen, Scott, Tannahill, &c., he ranged over the wider fields of English, Welsh, and Irish song and story, thereafter giving proof of his versatility, by admirable sketches of the great German composers, with illustrative examples from their best works, returning, in his last programme, to—

"The sangs my faither loved to hear,
The sangs my mither sang."

The concluding concert of Tuesday last embraced a history of song writers from James I. down to recent times, given, in a racy manner, as connecting links to the various songs set down in the programme. Of these the spirited war-song, "Pibroch of Donuil Dhu," by Mr Dunn, evoked a loud response, and his rendering of "O Nannie wilt thou gang wi' me" was received with equal favour. Miss Eleanor Rees, a mezzo-soprano of considerable merit, who has ably assisted Mr Dunn throughout the series, pleased greatly in all she did, especially in the well-known "Caller Herrin'" and in the Jacobite song, "Flora Macdonald's Lament," which was given with much pathos and power. A most enjoyable evening concluded with the singing of "Auld Lang Syne."

Alexandra Palace.—At the Ballad Concert, given last Saturday, the principal singers were—Mdme Patey, Misses Featherby and Adeline Paget, Messrs Joseph Maas, Thurley Beale, and Henry Prenton, assisted by the Alexandra Palace Choir, conducted by Mr David Beardwell. Mdme Patey, in "A Winter Story," and "The Snow-white Rose;" Mr Joseph Maas, in Blumenthal's beautiful setting of "The Message," and in Balfe's "Come into the garden Maud;" Mr Thurley Beale, in Pinsuti's "Raft;" Miss Featherby, in Cowen's setting of "The Better Land;" and Miss Adeline Paget, in Ganz's popular "Nightingale's Trill," were heard with evident delight, applause and encores being plentiful. Solos on the pianoforte, by Herr Albert Henning, were also duly appreciated, and the concert altogether gave perfect satisfaction. The attractions for next Monday (Whit-Monday) are unusually numerous. They include plays in which Mr Henry Neville, Miss Helen Barry, and other popular artists will appear, six Variety Entertainments, in which the favourites of the music halls will take part, races in Myers's hippodrome, music by the bands of the Royal Horse Guards, the Irish Dragoons, and six Volunteer bands, illumination of the grounds, and firework display, Myers's circus in the concert room, pedestrianism, a balloon race, hansom cab races, an instantaneous photographic competition, assaults-at-arms, and trade exhibitions of "straw bonnet," "teapot," and "sweetmeat" making. The lessees make a special point of important reduction of fares from King's Cross, and other stations.

Miss Elizabeth Philp's Concert.—Miss Elizabeth Philp gave an evening concert at St James's Hall on Friday, the 19th inst., which was attended by an exceptionally numerous and brilliant audience. The talented lady was assisted by Mdmes Antoinette Sterling, Pearsall Clarke, Isabel Fassett, Bessie Waugh, Ada Brown, May Johnston, and Hutchinson, and by Messrs Maybrick, Percy Blandford, Theodore Marzials, Arthur Oswald, Frederick Walker (bringing London Vocal Union), Ondricek, Bendall, Morton, Diehl, and Sir Julius Benedict. Several new songs were introduced to the public for the first time by Miss Philp, perhaps the most successful of these being "Little Wanderers" (sung by Mdme Fassett), and the glee, "The Owl sits up in the Ivy Bush," given to perfection by the London Vocal Union, who also created a distinct effect in Miss Philp's part-song, "The Hop-pickers," late though it came in a programme of considerable length. That the vocal honours of the evening should have accrued to Mdme Antoinette Sterling is no matter of surprise. This gifted vocalist's many admirers had seldom heard her to such advantage. While her magnificent voice seems to retain its earliest freshness, it certainly gains in richness and in the pathetic quality which gave rise to the expression, "tears in the voice." Mdme Sterling's delivery of Miss Philp's most dramatic song, "The Poacher's Widow," was an event to be remembered; Charles Kingsley's famous words uttered by Mdme Sterling cannot fail to impress the coldest audience. On this occasion the audience was by no means a cold one, therefore the lady received a perfect ovation, and after her touching rendition of Blumenthal's new song, "Sunshine and Rain," she was re-called and applauded until she returned to the platform and sang "The Long Avenue." Mr Maybrick sang "The Little Hero," M. Ondricek played two violin solos, Miss Bessie Waugh two pianoforte pieces—both meeting with well-merited applause; Mr Marzials, who appeared to be suffering from a cold, and for whom it would have been better to claim the indulgence of the audience in the usual way, gave a song presumably of his own composition; and two very young ladies, the Misses May Johnston and Ada Brown, played Saint-Saëns' "Danse Macabre" as a duet for two pianofortes with such precision, brilliancy, and fulness of tone that they were enthusiastically encored. —Astur.

Miss Cowen's Dramatic Recital at Steinway Hall on Tuesday evening, May 16, was fully and fashionably attended. The programme included Ingelow's description of the "High tide on the Lincolnshire coast in 1571;" a scene from Shakspere's Two Gentlemen of Verona (with Miss Alice Cruttenden, her pupil); "Fanny Squeers' Tea Party," by Charles Dickens; "The King's Tragedy," by Rossetti; "Before Sedan," by Austin Dobson; "Waiting," by C. S. Calverly; and Re Henry's "Lecture on Free Woman." Each of these pieces were recited by Miss Cowen with "due emphasis and discretion;" indeed Miss Cowen may be looked up to as a model by young elocutionists, so distinct is her articulation, so well rounded her phrasing. Miss Santley and Miss Fanny Robertson varied the programme by singing various songs and duets, and the whole entertainment was thoroughly enjoyed.

Herr Sigismund Lehmeyer gave the first of his series of Pianoforte Recitals at the new Chamber Concert Room in St James's Hall, on Wednesday evening, May 24, with his pupils, the Misses Williams, Misses Schafer and Sorrell, and Mr G. Sumpter, assisted by Mdme Palmiero and Miss Fusselle as vocalists. The Misses Williams began the "recital" by playing Beethoven's overture to Egmont, arranged for two performers on one pianoforte. Herr Lehmeyer followed with a Prelude, Fugue and Gavotte, by J. S. Bach, afterwards giving Beethoven's Sonata, in D minor, Op. 29, two short pieces by Schumann, a Nocturne, by Chopin, and Gottschalk's "Danse Ossianique," finishing the "recital" by playing, with his pupil, Mr Sumpter, a "Grand March à quatre mains," by Schubert. Miss Sorrell's contributions were—Hiller's "Zur Guitare," and Schumann's "Arabesque;" Miss Sinclair's, Gottschalk's "Banjo," as well as Charles Mayer's "Fontaine" (the last named particularly well played); and Miss Schafer's, the Prelude, Fugue, and Presto, from Handel's Suite, in D minor. The young ladies altogether showed signs of having profited by their master's valuable instruction. Miss Fusselle sang Gounod's "O that we two were Maying," and a new song, "Come back" (G. Silney). Mdme Palmiero gave Tosti's "Good-bye." Both ladies received applause due to their respective merits. Herr Lehmeyer's next recital is announced for Wednesday, June 28.

A MORNING as well as an Evening Concert were given at Lower Clapton, on Monday, May 22, in aid of the All Saints' Vicarage Building and School Enlargement Fund, under the patronage of the Lady George Hamilton, Mdmes Walsham and How, and William Elliott. The singers were principally amateurs, among whom was the accomplished Mrs Sutton Sharpe, who appeared as vocalist, pianist, and composer (in each character worthily sustaining her reputation), and Mr Spencer Tyler, the possessor of a tenor voice that many professional singers might envy. The instrumentalists were—Mr Arthur W. Payne, R.A.M. (violin); Mrs Avenell, Miss Florence Andrews, R.A.M., and Miss Mary Chatterton (harp). The concert went off with spirit, and a handsome sum, no doubt, was realized, the concert in the evening being exceedingly well attended

MR JOHN GILL'S Amateur Choral Society gave their annual concert in the concert-room of the Royal Academy of Music on Monday evening, May 22, when M. Gounod's "petit oratorio," Tobie, was given, the principal singers being Misses Hopkinson and Ashton Jonson, Messrs Buels and Poole. Mendelssohn's beautiful setting of the Psalm, "As the Hart pants," and the "Agnus Dei," from Rossini's Messe Solennelle, were in the first part of the concert, the second consisting of miscellaneous songs, from Mr Frederick Clay's Lalla Rookh, and other melodious sources. Miss Frost presided at the pianoforte, and went through her arduous task à merveille. Messrs Eaton Faning and Charlton Speer were at the organ, and Mr John Gill conducted.

PROVINCIAL.

SOUTHSEA.—At Miss Emeline Dickson's concert on Wednesday evening, May 16th, Miss Emma Barnett, one of our most distinguished lady pianists, was the "attraction of the evening." She gave "The Ebbing Tide," and "Caprice Brillante," the compositions of her brother, Mr John Francis Barnett, and Chopin's Polonaise in E flat. Her playing was remarkable for elegance and power, combined with perfect execution. The audience, which was very numerous and included Prince and Princess Edward of Saxe-Weimar, were evidently charmed with Miss Barnett, manifesting their approbation by encoring and re-calling her after each performance.

NORWICH.—The twenty-second concert of the Norfolk and Norwich Musical Union took place at St Andrew's Hall on Friday evening, May 19th, under the leadership of Dr E. Bunnett, who, since the formation of the Society, has exerted himself con amore to render its concerts attractive. The concert under notice equalled any of its predecessors. Mr J. F. Barnett's Building of the Ship, which formed the first part of the programme, was heard for the first time in Norwich, and was remarkably well rendered both by principal singers and chorus, a fact testified by the frequent and discriminating applause of the audience. The chorus for ladies voices, "Beautiful they were"; the duet, "When the hot long day was over," and the chorus for male voices, "O worthy Master," were among the most successful numbers. The unaccompanied quartet, "How beautiful she is," was so exceptionally well given that it had to be repeated, the audience taking no denial. The principal singers were Misses Helen Stark and B. Allen, Messrs Meers and Brockbank. In the second part of the concert a new song by Dr Bunnett, "The last prayer," was charmingly sung by Miss Alden, and the same composer's part song, "Beware," was warmly applauded. Mr F. Noverre led the band, Mr Walter Lain presided at the organ, and Dr Bunnett conducted.

AMSTERDAM.—Edouard de Hartog, the Dutch composer, is appointed member of the Committee of Fine Arts (Musical Section) at the Universal Exhibition to be held here next year.

MILAN.—Writing to the Perseveranza in reference to Ambroise Thomas's Françoise de Rimini, Capponi mentions eleven different operas founded on the subject immortalised, one each being written by Borgatti, Genoa, 1827; Mercadante, Madrid, 1829; Generali, Venice, 1829; Quillici, Florence, 1831; Staffa, Naples, 1831; Demasini, Milan, 1841; Carnetti, Vicenza, 1843; Froncheni, Lisbon, 1857; Macarini, Milan, 1871; Cagnoni, Turin, 1871; and Götz, Germany, 1871.—(Qy. Macaroni?—Dr Bülge.)

GERMAN OPERA, DRURY LANE.

A high average of merit having distinguished the performance of Lohengrin on the opening night, it was with assurance rather than hope of enjoyment that a fairly large audience assembled on Saturday, to witness Der Fliegende Holländer. Wagner's early opera keeps its hold upon the public, though it has now become quite familiar, and even an indifferent representation cannot do much to spoil the enjoyment of its romantic story and picturesque music. We have seen the work in an Italian dress, associated with artists who mostly treated it as an Italian opera; and we have had it in the English theatre with the haphazard procedure inevitable where there are no guiding traditions. Even thus, Der Fliegende Holländer has gained upon us; how much more may it do so as now presented by admirable representatives of the stage for which it was created! We may depend upon the fidelity and conscientiousness of this German Company. They do their work in a serious spirit, every man and woman, from the highest to the lowest, meaning business. That they are all great artists cannot be said, and as vocalists it is likely that a frequenter of Italian opera would pronounce them second-rate. But Wagner knows how to write "music-dramas" in which singing, if it have place at all, goes for little, while at the declamation he has substituted, his Drury Lane interpreters are certainly adepts. Der Fliegende Holländer being, as regards the composer, almost pre-historic, demands some singing, and only with reference to one or two of the artists—Frau Sucher (Senta) and Herr Wolff (Erik), for example—can we say that its requirements were met in a manner specially noticeable. The representation was, however, striking and impressive, by reason of the thoroughness so remarkably evident in the performance of Lohengrin. There was no shirking; no coming out of the drama at intervals to survey the house or talk to neighbours and striking into it again. Nor were the assumptions half-hearted—a kind of compromise between the personalities of the performer and of the character, based upon an understanding that each is to prevail in turn. By the way, this very conscientiousness has, in some cases, an awkward side. An artist trained on the Italian stage, could not present one of Wagner's black characters in all its sombreness. He would be sure to throw in a little light somewhere, dropping the mask now and then, or perpetrating some vocal tour de force, so as to make the audience forget the actor in the singer. The Germans do nothing of this kind. They go through with their work in the spirit of the Othello who stained his skin all over. Thus did Herr Eugen Gura, when playing the Dutchman on Saturday night. Uncompromising in his sadness and gloom, in the lugubriousness of his utterance, and in his extreme care to let it be seen that the curse was no sham, the artist went very near to making himself the cause of pain in others. Theoretically this may have been the crown of his success; practically it ran the risk of failure. Frau Sucher, who appeared as Senta, had no such provocation to unpleasantness; but, as far as opportunity allowed, confirmed the agreeable impression made by her Elsa on Thursday night. This artist is clearly one of high rank, not because she is an exceptional vocalist, nor on account of special histrionic gifts, but for the reason that such musical and dramatic qualifications as hers are rarely found united in the same person. Her Senta equally interested the admirers of acting and of singing. The first of these classes saw a poetic embodiment artistically carried out in all its details; while the second heard Wagner's music sung with intelligence and skill. As we have intimated, Herr Wolff gave satisfaction in the part of Erik; Herr Ehrke was a fair Daland, and the parts of the Steersman and Mary were efficiently sustained by Herr Landau and Fräulein Schefsky. Again the chorus earned hearty applause, not only for their singing but for the intelligent manner in which they acted upon a notion, usually strange to their class, of having some connection with the drama. Half the charm of these representations lies in the fact that a work is played instead of a dramatic form being gone through by costumed singers. The fact in opera is a novel one, and very refreshing. How the overture and accompaniments were rendered by Herr Richter's fine orchestra may be imagined. Indeed, the instrumental music seemed at times quite enough for the interest and for the illustration of the story. No guide book to it was wanted. It told its own tale, as music always will when genius appeals through it to the emotions, and not, as in so much of the Nibelung's Ring, to the perception of a crowd of arbitrary symbols.

THE "NIBELUNGEN" BAND.—The "Wagner Orchestra," conducted by Herr Seidl at Her Majesty's Theatre, comprises 8 first and 8 second violins, 6 violas, 4 violoncellos, 4 double basses, 3 flutes, 4 clarinets, 2 oboes, 1 Cor Anglais, 4 bassoons, 8 trumpets, 8 horns, 8 sax-tubas, 4 trombones, 1 contra-bass tuba, drums and triangles. Happily, Wagner depends comparatively but little upon the "quartet" which the great masters placed before everything else in importance; otherwise, the disproportion between wind and string would be enormously excessive. The members of the orchestra are, we understand, from Hamburgh and other towns adjacent.

COPYRIGHT IN MUSIC.—It has been of late a source of great annoyance to musical amateurs to occasionally find themselves subjected to the payment of a fine for singing a song at a village concert; for, while it has been in general assumed that no permission is necessary, certain owners of copyright have recently begun to insist on their extreme rights. Accordingly Mr Gorst, M.P., has introduced a Bill making it incumbent on the proprietor of the copyright in a musical composition, who is desirous of retaining the right of public representation in his own hands exclusively, to print outside the cover a notice that his consent is requisite for a public performance. In default of this being done, any action to recover penalties is to be dismissed.—Times.

Miss Rosa Kenney, assisted by some friends, gave a pleasant entertainment on Monday afternoon, May 15, at the Marlborough Rooms. Miss Kenney showed considerable elocutionary and comedy powers in some scenes from the School for Scandal—in which Mr Maclean very successfully portrayed Sir Peter Teazle—but the chief interest centred in her rendering of the potion scene in Romeo and Juliet, which was greeted with warm and deserved applause, for Miss Kenney proved herself capable of giving expression with natural force to intense emotion. The effort was successful in no small degree, and there can be no question of this lady's versatile talent, which should be encouraged and developed. Mr Sketchley caused great amusement by his selections from "Mrs Brown."—Sunday Times.

THE "NIBELUNG RING" PERFORMANCES.—We are informed that after the (first) representation of the Götterdämmerung Herr Neumann was summoned to the Royal box, where the Prince and Princess of Wales and other members of the Royal Family congratulated him on the success of the performance. The Prince of Wales remarked that he had seldom followed a work from beginning to end with such uninterrupted interest, and charged Herr Neumann with the expression of his satisfaction to the artists and to Wagner, whose compositions, his Royal Highness added, he had admired from his childhood. In reply, a telegram was yesterday received from the composer, expressing his thanks to the Prince of Wales for his gracious message, and to Herr Neumann and the singers for the excellent manner in which his work had been put before the English public.—Times.

His third character was that of Robert, in Robert le Diable. At the same house Schubert's three-act romantic opera, Alfonso und Estrella, according to the version of Fuchs, Vienna Capellmeister, has been produced and favourably received. Considering that the principal members of the company were absent, the performance was as good as could be expected.—Mr Augustus Harris has entered into an agreement with the manager of the Victoria Theatre to give a series of Robinson Crusoe, with scenery, dresses, properties, and corps de ballet, from the Theatre Royal, Drury Lane.—According to the Annual Register, just published, of the Association of Music-Masters and Mistresses, that body counts in Berlin some 200 members. "Messrs Boosey & Co. have done good service not only to amateurs but to art, by including in their series of volumes of national melodies 'The Songs of Scandinavia' and 'The Songs of Eastern Europe.' The first-named contains eighty-three examples; and the second, a hundred. We need not insist upon the importance of collections like these, whatever the country they represent; but we must say that no musical library is complete without the songs of Scandinavia and Eastern Europe. The editor, Mr J. A. Kappey, has taken great pains to secure melodies of a genuinely representative character, and at a time when attention is becoming more and more directed to folk-tunes as a source of new thematic ideas, the volumes in question are of peculiar value. They have our most hearty commendation, the 'Songs of Eastern Europe' more especially, since the volume contains, besides examples of Liszt, Chopin, and other masters, a very valuable collection of volkslieder from the hitherto untouched wealth of the Austrian provinces."—Daily Telegraph.

"Messrs Boosey & Co. have published two additional volumes of their National Songs, which appear likely to be the most interesting of the series. We know little of the rich repertory of Scandinavian Songs, and Mr and Miss Kappey, the editors of these books, are to be thanked for introducing some of the best specimens to public notice. Five of the Russian songs are so old as to be traditional; and in the series are to be found a beautiful Cossack lullaby by one Bachmetieff, a gipsy song by Lvoff, and several songs by Warlamoff. These and the Polish songs (all of which are traditional) may be considered among the most interesting items of a small but acceptable collection. Two ancient Lithuanian songs, a couple of Finnish, and four ancient Norwegian melodies, will likewise be found in the book. The majority of the Swedish songs are by Lindblad, that prolific song writer, who died in 1864. Tradition says that the old melody of 'The Beggar Boy' was once sung in the days when she was a poor child by the distinguished artist now known as Mdme Christine Nilsson. Included in the Danish songs is the traditional 'Dannebrog,' the music of which is attributed to one 'Bay.' It would be interesting to inquire the foundation for this statement, as the origin of the Danish National Anthem was generally understood to be unknown. The tradition of the 'Dannebrog Banner,' which, in 1719, fell down from heaven to bring victory to the Danish arms, is duly recorded in a footnote. Most of the Dutch songs given date back to the sixteenth century; and there are besides three songs by W. F. G. Nicolai, and one Flemish song. Altogether eighty-three of the national songs of northern Europe are included in this valuable and interesting book. In future editions a larger preface or more footnotes, giving further particulars of the old songs whose history is known, would be welcome. Equally interesting are the songs of Eastern Europe, recently issued by Messrs Boosey, and likewise edited by Mr and Miss Kappey. Among the thirty-four Austrian songs, the large majority are volkslieder, and they include Tyrolean, Styrian, and Polish songs, two of them by Chopin. These are followed by twenty-three characteristic specimens of Hungarian songs, giving a very fair idea of the peculiarities of Hungarian music, and comprising modern songs by Liszt, and some traditional songs of Bosnia, Moravia, and Dalmatia. The first of the Bohemian songs is the 'War-song of the Hussites,' once, it is believed, the national song of the country. A few specimens of Servian, Swiss, Greek, and even Turkish melodies. The last are very peculiar; and the peculiar intervals common to this and other Eastern music are claimed by some to have been handed down direct from the music of the ancient Hebrews."—Figaro.

"Miss Lillie Albrecht, the talented young composer and pianist, has again given her many friends and admirers an additional proof of her musical abilities, by the production of the 'Fantaisie Marziale,' a Morceau de Salon, for the pianoforte. We regard this work as one of the best that Miss Albrecht has yet done, displaying a rare amount of skill and talent; and this latest production will add greatly to the high reputation she has so deservedly gained. From a musical point of view it is charmingly spirited, and will doubtless receive due appreciation from all who really love first-class music. This young lady is well known in musical circles, and her skilful instrumentation is as clever as her compositions are excellent."—"The Court Circle," May, 1882.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

THE NIBELUNG'S RING.

May 31.

Last night the original programme of Herr Neumann's enterprise in this country was completed, and when the Walkyrie and Götterdämmerung have again been performed at "cheap prices," the Nibelung's Ring will return to the land which produced it. Wagner's trilogy has not proved a success amongst us. Our public saw its approach without enthusiasm, and will witness its departure with indifference. They refused to be stimulated even by the high prices, which bespoke expectation of a rush for tickets, nor could the remarkable prominence given to the subject by the entire metropolitan press save the theatre from a disheartening array of empty seats. In so far as this bespoke lack of healthy interest in musical developments we unfeignedly regret it. A nation really progressive in art matters is neither prejudiced on the one hand nor indifferent on the other. It condemns nothing without trial, and on nothing turns its back with a yawn. For ourselves, we must confess to a suspicion that England is deficient in musical curiosity. The novelty market here hardly knows what a brisk demand means, and, as a rule, sellers realize at a loss. Herr Neumann has found this out, and possibly thinks less of us in consequence. But here all the blame does not justly lie on one side. The quality of the goods had a great deal to do with the slackness of their sale. Many of us suspected them at the first; on trial we did not like them; and in the exercise of our right we finally rejected them. That action does not want for champions and vindicators. We, for example, are prepared to justify it, out and out, as healthy and wise. More, it is clear that the attitude of English amateurs towards the Nibelung's Ring has been worthy of a nation which prides itself on a love of fair play. Our public fully recognized the extraordinary talent shown in the work, and did honour to its many masterful pages; they witnessed its performance with profound attention, and when compelled to an adverse opinion, expressed it, on the whole, in a judicial spirit rather than in the temper of a partizan. Richard Wagner is fond of imagining the existence of cabals. His measureless self-esteem prompts him to dream of unending conspiracies, all destined to lay him in the dust. Now it is an entire people who, though usually given to minding their own business, set in motion against his peace and credit an elaborate and powerful machinery, and now it is his natural enemies the critics who malignantly intrigue against a man by whom their incompetence has been found out. Herr Wagner will be at a loss how to lay the fate of his Nibelung's Ring, in London, at the door of a conspiracy. That easy way of explanation barred against him, it is just possible he may condole with Herr Neumann on having mistaken the bounds of civilization, and unwittingly taken the Nibelung's Ring over into barbarism. Happily, the sarcasm of Bayreuth is now more known than feared.

Looking back upon the entire matter, we see, before all, the trial of a "new art," which consists in a novel application of music to drama. This question may be considered without reference to the work which exemplifies it before the world, and really lies in a very small compass. It stands apart from such considerations as the abolition of the aria, and other set forms. We may concede all these to Wagner, because the life of music does not lie in them. The pith of the controversy is here—whether dramatic music shall be employed as the language of emotion, or whether, by the adoption of themes representing motives, purposes, events, and characters, it shall be transformed into a vocabulary of comment and explanation. This question cannot be evaded, neither will any argument round about it, nor any cloud of words designed to obscure it, in the least avail. It is a question which involves all that music is worth, since upon the issue turns the entire purpose of the art. Here, in fact, is no matter of law and form, but of life; no matter of development, but of transformation; no matter of outward change, but of inward renewal. We confess to amazement at the boldness of Wagner's idea, whether it was forced upon him, as he declares, by "unconscious necessity," or invented "of malice aforethought." It is an idea worthy of those mythic giants who, in the dim of the world's past, made war on heaven and strove to pull the gods from their seats. It impresses us with the arrogance of conscious strength, and with the daring of its implication that the true use of music in drama, which "Prophets and kings desired to see, But died without the sight," has at length been revealed to a greater than they all. Amazement only deepens as we contemplate the hopelessness of this new departure. Wagner must change human nature before he can excite more than an intellectual admiration of his "new art." Lovers of novelty, admirers of the ingenious, and those whose cue is to identify themselves with innovation, run after it on grounds quite intelligible. But the nature of things always proves too strong for any artifice which ventures to defy it; and whenever, in the Nibelung's Ring, Wagner achieves a musical triumph, he does so quite apart from his musical system. There are pages in the work supremely illustrative of the method he has devised. Yet the public allow these to pass with complete indifference, either not knowing what they mean, or, knowing, regarding them with merely a cold perceptiveness. The same public is moved, however, when the music presents a significance other than that arbitrarily imposed upon it—when its emotionalism throws off for a time the tyranny of "leit-motives," and, in native freedom, goes straight to the heart. Thus it is as Siegmund sings of Love and Spring; as the slumber music vibrates around the prostrate form of Brünnhilde; as young Siegfried rolls out exulting strains at the forge, or sits listening to forest noises, and as, in the end, the most solemn of marches bewails a hero's death—who then thinks of a system, and bends his faculties to the distinguishing of meanings? We are possessed by music which shakes itself free from forced alliances, and rejects all meanings save those conveyed in its own natural language—to be felt rather than perceived. Thus Wagner himself confutes Wagner. Why an elaborate artificial vocabulary when, at the most important moments, its application is unperceived, and the ear drinks in sound regardless of sense? Why, too, a waste of power in vain attempts to bend to unnatural purposes a spirit more subtle than Loge himself? The "inarticulate, unfathomable speech" of which Carlyle speaks laughs to scorn all attempts to tabulate its utterances and make them do duty as logarithms.

Turning from Wagner's system in the abstract it can hardly be denied that the Nibelung's Ring is, in certain respects, an unfortunate illustration. Its story can only be regarded, amongst ourselves, as a serious drawback. We do not, of course, pretend to speak of Teutonic taste as against the opinion of Wagner, who knows his own countrymen well; and inasmuch as the Nibelung's Ring was avowedly written for them, and them alone, we have no right to question the poet-composer's choice. Our worthy kinsfolk may not only reverence their national myth, but discern a soul-moving emanation from the personalities of gods, giants, dwarfs, singing dragons, talking birds, and other "properties" dear to the Brothers Grimm. Experience has just shown that these enchantments are nevertheless lost on the British mind, which instinctively refers them to Christmas and its time-honoured entertainment. To say that the British mind was puzzled by the nature of the drama is only to speak the truth. A pantomime head without a tail smacks of monstrosity; besides, where was the poetic justice which should have turned Wotan into Pantaloon and handed him over to the tender mercies of Clown Alberich. For this a magic lantern conflagration afforded a poor substitute, and applied a feeble salve to the irritated feelings of a much-enduring audience. It would be absurd to claim for our opera-going public an extreme sensibility. They are accustomed to sup upon horrors, and sit down to the feast with highly objectionable personages. But these are felt to be serious, whereas in the Nibelung's Ring we have an uncomfortable notion that there is a joke somewhere about among the horrors waiting to spring upon us. As to the morality of the characters and their actions we need not again be precise. Wagner's zealous apologists, who unreservedly apply to him a well-known axiom of the British Constitution, have endeavoured to "whitewash" both the master and his creations. We do not blame them, inclining rather to admire, if unable to imitate, the ingenuousness that "thinketh no evil," even when evil stands before them unclothed. Unhappily for their argument, it is confuted out of the story itself. The moral laws which these creatures of the early world—these cosmic children—are said to have known nothing about, actually had guardians in high places. What, for example, does Fricka represent when she storms down upon her wretched husband and forces that contemptible deity to avenge a crime against marital honour? Why, even the reprobate himself acknowledges, in appearance at least, the virtue of an agreement, and only seeks to break it by means of an agent, who does not know what he is doing. Assuming all that has been advanced on the other side, nothing excuses Wagner for filling his theatre with such a foul atmosphere. Vice never has a right upon the stage except when it works for virtue, and gratuitous crime there is always gratuitous offence.

For another reason we must look upon the Nibelung's Ring as an unfortunate embodiment of Wagner's system. That reason is found in the excessive hardihood with which it carries out the idea that the drama should make no concession to music, and that, even when allied to the sister art, it should be as realistic as possible. Never was there such an illustration as the danger attendant upon riding a hobby. Those terribly long dialogues, with hardly a melodic phrase to enlist on the side of music the finest of instruments, and that absence of concerted passages—because, forsooth, people do not usually all speak at once in actual life—are examples of artistic fanaticism which, in passionate revolt against error, blinds itself to truth. We do not deny that Wagner has done more than any man to purge the operatic stage of stupid conventionalities, which, by making it ridiculous, degraded it. Therein lies a credit peculiarly his own, but he has himself, in avoiding Scylla, steered upon Charybdis. The lyric stage is, in its very nature, conventional, and we should be prepared to argue, if the time were opportune, that it exists, not for drama, which has a stage of its own, but for music as applied to drama. Wagner, we all know, advances an opposite opinion, and, sternly carrying it out in the Nibelung's Ring, banishes music from his boards, as far as that may be done, and confines it to the orchestra. He has since found reason to modify his practice in this respect, and restore to the stage some portion at least of its abstracted charm. But we have not here to do with his penitential processes, though the return of so magnificent a sinner might well make all the harps in the heaven of art send forth the sounds of joy. It concerns us chiefly that the Nibelung's Ring carries the realistic idea to an extreme, and results in a thing which is neither opera nor drama, but a mixture of both, wherein each ingredient does its best to spoil the other.

Having regard to the considerations touched upon above, we affect no regret at the artistic failure of the trilogy in London. The result was hoped for, and is now rejoiced over, not out of passion or prejudice, nor because of any sectarian feeling, but from an honest conviction that its principles are the reverse of those which make for the good of the lyric stage. At the same time, it would be ungracious in the extreme not to acknowledge the enterprise that brought the Nibelungen to our shores and the ability of the artists who represented it. Herr Neumann has established a claim upon our goodwill such as may yet do him service, while the talents of Mdme Vogl, Mdme Reicher-Kindermann, Herr Niemann, Herr Vogl, Herr Schlosser, and their fellow-workers are likely to be remembered for many a day. They have set before us a great work and, though some of us do battle fairly and squarely with its principles, we shall not lose sight of the obligation which an opportunity for supporting truth and fighting error has imposed.—D. T.

Michael William Balfe.—In the belief that the name of Balfe, as that of the first British composer to elevate the English lyric drama to a high position, and to compete with the musicians of France, Germany, Italy, and Spain, deserves to be nationally recorded, a memorial was recently addressed to the Dean of Westminster, by professors of Music in the Universities, eminent conductors, heads of musical educational establishments, and most of the cathedral organists in the United Kingdom, expressing an earnest desire that a tablet may be placed in Westminster Abbey, "To the memory of a musician, whose genius and achievements won for him, during his lifetime, a high reputation, not only among his countrymen, but also upon the Continent of Europe." This memorial has been most readily complied with; and the tablet which is intended to remind future generations of their debt to a man of fruitful genius will soon, it may be hoped, take its place among similar monuments, where its presence will honour alike the departed musician and those surviving members of his profession who, having been his contemporaries, unite in paying their tributes of admiration to his memory.—Daily Telegraph.

CARL ROSA'S OPERA COMPANY AT MANCHESTER.

We have so often been assured of the speedy doom of old-fashioned opera that we ought, perhaps, to hesitate about affirming that it possesses an extraordinary amount of vitality. Yet if opera as understood by Glück, Mozart, Beethoven, Weber, Rossini, Auber, Meyerbeer, Bellini, Balfe, and Verdi is destined to die, it will die hard. We hear of Wagnerian four-night festivals at Her Majesty's Theatre, and Wagnerian cycles at Drury Lane; but at Covent Garden Il Trovatore, La Traviata, Dinorah, and La Favorita, &c., are heard with unmistakable delight, and Mr Carl Rosa, himself an ardent admirer of Wagner, still finds his account in performances of works in which the conventional "air" and old time-honoured forms of concerted music are not replaced by declamation and "motives." The Bohemian Girl is still, we understand, the most popular of all operas with provincial audiences, and we do not believe there is any less willingness on the part of local audiences to enjoy opera in English when given under conditions such as those to which this company has long accustomed us. Mr Rosa was well advised to begin his season of six nights with an opera which, though in some respects one of the most interesting he ever produced, has not been heard often enough to make us grow weary of it. The libretto follows Shakspere so closely that it is almost unrivalled as an opera comedy, and the music throughout is so sparkling and witty, so fresh and melodious, that the fun of the play is sometimes almost intensified by the musical treatment. This, moreover, is thoroughly scholarly, and The Merry Wives almost takes rank as a classic, so that the amateur by whom even Donizetti would be disdained* listens to Nicolai's charming work with the same sort of pleasure he derives from Le Nozze di Figaro and Les Deux Journées. In every act, indeed, the score displays the hand of a master, and we venture to predict that it will be heard with delight long after many which now enjoy a greater popularity shall have been consigned to merited neglect.

We have several times noticed the performance of this opera when the cast differed little from that of last night, and it is satisfactory to have again to remark the general attention to effect in every department. Pretty and characteristic scenery, beautiful costumes, and effective grouping added much to the enjoyment of the performance, and the leading parts had been confided to competent singers, all familiar with the music. Though here and there certain shortcomings might be noticeable, the general effect was satisfactory—certainly far beyond what we were accustomed to hear before the days of Mr Carl Rosa.

As Mrs Ford and Mrs Page these clever artists, Miss Gaylord and Miss Yorke, have characters admirably adapted to display both their musical skill and histrionic ability, and their singing and acting were not less enjoyed than heretofore. Miss Perry always sings with earnestness, and she was well supported by Mr J. W. Turner, whose delivery of Fenton's serenade was deservedly applauded. Mr Ludwig's Mr Ford is a performance of great merit, and by his fine singing and careful acting this gentleman more than maintained his well-deserved renown. Mr Pope as Master Page was painstaking, and avoided extravagance; and it is altogether needless to say that Master Slender, in the hands of Mr Lyall, was a remarkable example of clever grotesque acting; one, indeed, much too rare on the English stage. Mr Snazelle played the fat knight, if we mistake not, for the first time in Manchester. If his Falstaff cannot be called Shaksperian, it was often amusing, and a perfect singing Sir John is not to be met with every day. If Mr Brooklyn would take a lesson in restraint from Mr Snazelle, the effect of the tavern scene would be improved, for the incongruous introduction of a tobacco pipe in a play of Plantagenet times was a departure from the spirit of Elizabethan comedy. The opera was conducted by Mr Pew with his accustomed care.—Examiner and Times.

Miss Florence Waud.—The problem of elevating the working classes by means of pianoforte music is in a fair way of being solved by Miss Florence Waud, for, at the concert given last week by this clever and constantly improving young artist at the Victoria Music Hall, the audience, largely composed of labouring men and women, was roused by her performance to a high state of enthusiasm. The pieces presented were by no means of an ultra-popular kind. But Chopin's Polonaise in C (the violin part by Mr Pollitzer) was sufficiently appreciated to be re-demanded; and Miss Waud was also called upon to repeat Liszt's fantasia on airs from Le Prophète, for which, however, she substituted Scharwenka's series of "Polish Dances." The fair concert-giver was supported by vocalists innumerable.—Whitehall Review.

GERMAN OPERA, DRURY LANE.

The production of Tannhäuser, equally with the performance of Lohengrin, and more than that of Der Fliegende Holländer, honourably distinguished the German season. After three nights' experience of these representations, and while fully recognizing certain defects, an idea is forming in the public mind that we are seeing Wagner's early operas for the first time—for the first time, that is to say, as regards their spirit, if not their letter, and with reference to the dramatic conditions they exact. As we remarked in a previous notice, Tannhäuser, Lohengrin, and their fellows, when put on a foreign stage, are often presented more in accord with the traditions of that stage than with those of the one from which they have been transplanted. At Covent Garden, for example, they become quasi-Italian works, the artists naturally treating them much as they would an opera to the Italian manner born. How different that is from the German method appears in the apparent forgetfulness of the actors that they are playing to an audience at all; in the uniformly strict attention paid by the least important person on the stage to the progress of the work, and in the stately repose, or slow, majestic motion, recalling what history tells us as to the characteristics of Greek drama. With the style of representation now exemplified at Drury Lane, the protracted scenes in which Wagner indulges seem quite to accord; as emphatically they do not with the more buoyant life and vivacious action of Italian opera. This leads us to point out that whoever desires a genuine acquaintance with Wagner's early works should permit the Germans to act as introducers. In such a case there can be no mistake, and in the mind of the auditor each drama will stand or fall fairly upon its merits. The cast of Tannhäuser is a strong one, for proof of which we need hardly do more than refer to the fact that Frau Sucher plays Elizabeth, and that Herr Winkelmann devotes to the unhappy victim of sensual passion the talents which distinguished his Lohengrin. Frau Sucher's success was, if anything, greater as Elizabeth than as Elsa. This might have been expected, given a comparison of the two characters and a knowledge of the lady's powers. Despite the charm that surrounds Elsa she is a weak personage, who takes the earliest possible opportunity of doing that which she had expressly engaged not to do. Elizabeth, on the contrary, is all strength and devotion—"faithful unto death." The character is as grand as it is pure, and adapted to excite a true artist to the high effort which can only arise from unalloyed sympathy with the theme. That it brought forth all the enthusiasm of a gifted woman, and displayed her full powers, is beyond question. The acting of Frau Sucher was again worthy of study. Never fussy and demonstrative, and never tame, it charmed by that truth to nature which seems more true for the touch of art that graces it. We are at a loss for special illustrations of the fact, seeing that the embodiment was uniformly good. But mention may be made of the scene with which the second act closes, and that wherein the well-known prayer is offered. In the one, strength of feeling which never lost dignity and grace, and, in the other, pathos which went straight to the heart, helped to rank this effort among the greatest of its kind. Frau Sucher sang as well as she acted. Her delivery of the prayer—to mention only one thing in proof—was as pure an example of refined vocalization as could be desired. We must speak in equal terms of Herr Winkelmann's Tannhäuser—an impersonation that struck a grand note at the outset and sustained it to the end. The part was powerfully acted, Herr Winkelmann's dramatic talent easily meeting the accumulated demands upon it. He was most forcible, perhaps, in the last scene, and certainly none the less so because he refrained from rant and exaggeration. A more striking piece of acting and declamation than the long solo in the interview with Wolfram rarely calls for applause; while the lyrical portions of Tannhäuser's music were given in a style suggestive rather of Italian than of German vocal art. Herr Koegel was, perhaps, hardly at his best as the Landgraf, but Herr Gura (Wolfram) improved upon his "form" as the Dutchman, and would have done so still more had he not dragged the "Star" song till it became wearisome. Fraulein Wiedermann (Venus), Herr Landau (Walther), Herr Wolff (Heinrich), and Herr Ehrke (Bitterolf) did useful work in their respective parts, while the chorus and stage management gave no reason for complaint. Herr Richter's orchestra was a treat to hear. The delicacy of its accompaniment could not have been surpassed any more than could the admirable balance of tone and the just expression with which, from time to time, the solo passages were executed.—D. T.

In Beethoven's Fidelio the German company enjoyed another opportunity of enforcing their claims upon our music-loving public, of which they availed themselves by giving a highly dramatic performance of a genuine masterpiece. The forces at command were again ample for carrying out that unity of purpose which has hitherto marked these representations. The band, under Herr Richter, unmistakably asserted its importance. Besides heightening the pleasure of the audience, when interest was centred upon the stage, by accompaniments that never failed in exact measure and quality, the orchestra gave the utmost gratification in the overtures No. 4 (Fidelio) and No. 3 (Leonora). At the present moment the Leonora is perhaps the most popular of all overtures with amateurs. Listening to every phrase, the audience seemed to be waiting for the stirring fiddle passage towards the end, which, like the final gallop of a race, never fails to cause the greatest excitement. The applause was uproarious, but Herr Richter wisely resisted the demand for an encore. One hardly acceptable feature in the band is the peculiar prominence of the "tympani." The effect, usually heard when Beethoven murmurs or thunders on the drums, was not found. It is a small matter, perhaps; but is not the observance of details the avowedly strong point of this company? Considerable interest was felt in the first appearance of Fräulein Malten (Leonora), whose fame had preceded her; and that interest was increased when the lady, imposing of stature and of handsome presence, was seen in the dress of her part. Seldom, if ever, has an artist looked more becoming in the garb assumed by Leonora, and the sight called up the thought that, if the débutante could act and sing as well as she looked, an impersonation of special excellence would be secured. Conviction quickly followed that Fräulein Malten is an actress of experience and exceptional powers; at the same time, it must be said that reports of the lady's vocal talent were more tardily justified. At first the voice sounded uncertain and veiled; but in the trio with Rocco and Marcelline its strength and richness were at once proclaimed. Later on, in the recitative and aria, Fräulein Malten had the fullest opportunity of displaying her vocal qualities. The recitative was delivered with great force and intensity of expression, the voice proving equal to every demand; in the aria, however, signs of fatigue were manifested. Fräulein Malten has not escaped the tendency of modern German singing to injure the voice, and mar the art of vocalization. But it would be wrong to judge her simply as a vocalist, for she is a genuine dramatic artist, and unquestionably one of high rank. Her conception of the character of the devoted wife is full and harmonious throughout. In it tenderness, pity, and love are blended with guileless intrigue and daring courage. Such qualities enabled her to gain, throughout the evening, frequent proofs of high appreciation. The important part of Rocco was but feebly played and sung by Herr P. Ehrke. In past years bass singers of remarkable powers lifted the "Jailer" into a very prominent place. Herr Ehrke is unfortunate when judged by those who recollect Carl Formes in his prime. On the other hand, the part of Florestan has seldom been more satisfactorily filled than by Herr J. Wolff. In the air which opens the second act he was admirable in voice and feeling, while his impassioned accents, when in vision he beholds Leonora, created a thrilling effect. Pizarro was ably represented by Dr Kraus, whose strident tones upheld the voice part against the full strength of the band. But perhaps his success in the "Revenge" air was in a great measure due to the skill of Herr Richter, who, without losing vigour, gave the singer an opportunity of being heard distinctly from beginning to end. Marcelline was unobtrusively played by Fräulein Wiedermann, the part of her lover, Jacquino, devolving upon Herr L. Landau. The members of the choir again showed that they not only could sing effectively, but also act with intelligence. In the famous chorus of prisoners they gave proof of uncommon merit.—P. G.

On Tuesday night, Richard Wagner's eighth opera, Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg, was produced with brilliant success, under the direction of Herr Hans Richter, and in presence of a large audience, among whom were their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh. There is much to say of the work and its performance, but for the present we can only refer to the one as a charming example of its composer's lighter mood and happier genius, and to the other as about the most perfect thing of its kind ever presented on an English stage. Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg should make the fortune of the enterprise with which it is now associated, and the chances are, judging by the universal applause of Tuesday night, that we shall have to chronicle some such result. Each act was received with enthusiasm, the curtain being raised again and again. To the meaning of the demonstrations indulged in by the audience we cheerfully subscribe. Die Meistersinger is beautiful, and, putting the work side by side with Der Ring des Nibelungen, we cannot fail to see that it both vindicates and avenges art.

SCRAPS FROM PARIS.

(From our Correspondent.)

At the Grand Opera, M. Ambroise Thomas's Françoise de Rimini still figures in the bills, and, to avoid as long as possible any change in the cast, M. Vaucorbeil has secured M. Lassalle (Malatesta) till the middle of this month, buying that artist's holiday up to then. Maurel returned some time since, and chose Hamlet for his re-appearance. The chief novelty for the winter will be Henri VIII., book by MM. Léonce Detroyat and Armand Silvestre, music by M. Camille Saint-Saëns. The official reading took place the week before last. The following is the cast: Catherine of Arragon, Mdlle Krauss; Anne Boleyn, Mdlle Richard; Henry VIII., Lassalle; Gomez de Feria, Sellier; the Pope's Legate, Boudouresque; and the Duke of Norfolk, Lorrain. Besides Henri VIII., a two-act work, by M. E. Pessard, and a new ballet, book by the authors of Yedda, for Mdlle Mauri, will be put in rehearsal forthwith.

At the Opéra-Comique, Galante Aventure has been withdrawn after anything but a long run and its place taken by Le Nozze di Figaro, or Les Noces de Figaro, as it is here styled. The subjoined interesting information relative to the fortunes of this marvellous work in France is taken from Le Ménestrel:

"But let us go back to the arrival in France of the first of the three universally consecrated masterpieces written by the divine Mozart, so justly surnamed the Raphael of Music; it took place on the 20th March, 1793, on the stage of our Grand Opera, seven years after the first performance at the Imperial Operahouse, Vienna (1st May, 1786). In the work as translated by Notaris, the dialogue of Beaumarchais alternated with Mozart's music. The French version was divided into five acts and bore in the bills the same title as the original comedy: Le Mariage de Figaro. The copious prose of Beaumarchais added to Mozart's voluminous score rendered the work of immoderate length. Moreover, the artists of the Opera, little familiar with the art of delivering spoken-dialogue, cut a rather bad figure in the characters entrusted to them, and which the public were accustomed to see played by actors of talent. Lays, too, on whom devolved the task of representing Figaro, did not possess any of the qualities requisite for pourtraying the physiognomy of the lively barber. He was heavy and dull, the memoirs of the time tell us. Adrien sang the Count; Mdme Ponteuil, the Countess; and Mdlle Gavaudan, Suzanne. When we add that French ears were still half closed to delicate music, the reader will not be astonished that the work achieved no success. Le Mariage de Figaro, as served up by Notaris, ran only five nights, and fell before the insufficiency of the receipts. The first performance produced, it is true, 5,035 francs, a tolerably respectable sum for that epoch, but, at the fifth, the takings amounted to only the ridiculous total of 448 francs! On the 14th November, 1807, Le Mariage de Figaro was performed at the Opéra-Comique by order of the Minister of the Palace, so at least we are informed, without further details, by the catalogue of the Musical Library of the Opera. Was this performance the only one or was it followed by others? We cannot say. But the real first performance in France of Mozart's masterpiece dates only from the year 1858, when M. Carvalho gave it with a new translation, by MM. Jules Barbier and Michel Carré, at the Théâtre-Lyrique. Its success, as we know, was considerable. Subsequently, in 1872, the artist-manager transported the famous score to the Opéra-Comique."

The cast at the Théâtre-Lyrique was as follows: the Countess, Mad. Vandenheuvel-Duprez; Suzanne, Mad. Ugalde; and Cherubin, Mad. Carvalho; a vocal trio not to be surpassed or even equalled at that epoch. At present, Mad. Carvalho enacts the Countess: Mdlle Vanzandt, Cherubin; and Mdlle Isaac, Suzanne. Mdlle Ducasse appears as Marceline, and Mdlle Molé as Fanchette. Fugère plays Figaro, and Taskin is Count Almaviva. The revival has been extremely successful artistically and pecuniarily, the receipts often exceeding 9000 francs. Méhul's Joseph, which has been in preparation for some time past and has not been given since 1866, was to have been produced last Friday, the 26th ult., but, owing to the indisposition of M. Danbé, the conductor, the event has been postponed till Friday the 2nd inst. Joseph will be played by Talazac and Benjamin by Mad. Bilbaut-Vauchelet. There was some talk of having the renowned chorus, "Dieu d'Israël," sung by the pupils of the Conservatory, but that intention has been abandoned. An opera which will be put in rehearsal very soon, although not to be brought out before the Autumn, is Lakmé, book by MM. Goudinet and Gille, music by Léo Delibes. There is, also, a prospect of Victor Massé's Cléopâtre, of a Manon Lescaut by Massenet, and of a revival of G. Bizet's Carmen, with Mdlle Mauduit, formerly of the Grand Opera, as the heroine.

MM. Hartmann and Vianesi have signed an agreement with M. Ballande to rent the Théâtre des Nations of him for a short season. It is their intention to get up three operas—Wagner's Lohengrin, Massenet's Hérodiade, and Boïto's Mefistofele. Some persons assert that M. Ballande's temporary sub-lessees have an ulterior object in view: that, namely, of making their present enterprise simply a stepping-stone to the foundation of the much-desired Théâtre-Lyrique, with an annual grant from the Government of 200,000 francs, and from the Municipality of 300,000. If so, they have a rival in M. Paul Ferry. That gentleman, however, who is stated to have the command of well-nigh unlimited capital, would re-establish the Lyrique on the site of the old Grand Café Parisien, in the Place de la République, and his scheme has been for some time past under consideration in the proper quarters. He was formerly a dramatic agent, then the director of a paper called La Comédie, and afterwards manager of the Grand Théâtre, Havre, but his management lasted only a few weeks.

A most interesting event lately was the sale at the Hôtel Drouot of M. Savoye's collection of 214 musical instruments, dating from the 15th, 16th, 17th, and 18th centuries. Among them may be mentioned the small piano given by Gluck to J. J. Rousseau, and afterwards the property successively of Grétry and Nicolo Isouard; Marie Louise's piano, also, figured in the list.

A new society, the Union of Young French Composers, has just been founded with the object of giving every year a certain number of fortnightly concerts for the performance of unpublished works by the active, or composing members, who are limited to twenty, and already include Mdlle Augusta Holmès, MM. André Wormser, Octave Fouque, and other less known aspirants for artistic fame. There is a committee appointed to superintend the performance of the works sent in, but without power to pass judgment or reject them. To enable the Society to carry out their scheme, an appeal is made to the lovers of music to become honorary members, paying five-and-twenty francs annually, and receiving in return so many tickets for each concert.—Q.

YESTERDAY afternoon the Duke of Edinburgh was to visit Maidstone, and address a public meeting in the Corn Exchange on behalf of the Royal College of Music, with the object of raising a fund in order to establish a scholarship for Kent.

AT the monthly meeting of the Musical Association, to be held at 27, Harley Street on Monday afternoon next, Dr H. Hiles, of Manchester, will read a paper entitled "From Rhythmic Pulsation to Classical Outline." After this has been discussed, an apparatus, invented by Herr J. Föhr, of Stuttgart, for writing down by electricity any music played on a pianoforte, will be exhibited, and Mr T. L. Southgate will explain the working of the instrument.

HERR ANGELO NEUMANN has leased Her Majesty's Theatre for October next, when he intends to bring over a first-rate troupe of German operatic artists and ballet to produce the latest and most successful German operas in London. A few of Wagner's operas will also be placed on the stage, but the greatest attraction for the public will undoubtedly be the new and fashionable operas.—Morning Post.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The popularity of Gounod's Romeo e Giulietta, when Mdme Adelina Patti appears as one of the ill-fated lovers, was made evident last Friday by the very large audience that visited the theatre. The character of Giulietta presents irresistible attractions to a lady so admirably adapted by nature and art for meeting its requirements. Fragile in form, youthful in appearance, and with personal characteristics distinguishing the Southern race, Mdme Patti is able to present the Veronese maiden in a way that few rival. Moreover, the music of the French composer supplies many and varied opportunities for the display of her vocal skill. In the air, "Nella calma," the singer, on Friday evening, absolutely revelled in graces of vocalization, and, unfatigued by the arduous exercise, repeated the song at the desire of her gratified audience. Her lyrical powers were never found wanting. In the balcony scene, when, unwittingly, Giulietta betrays her affection, the simple tones were those indicative of girlhood, and the impassioned accents the natural outburst of suddenly-awakened love. In the marriage scene the strains uttered were idyllic in their peacefulness, and her farewell to the banished Romeo, now wild with grief, now calm with resignation, was not wanting in any aid that art could bring. Neither in the interviews with Friar Laurence did Mdme Patti fail to show dramatic powers, while in the final scene qualities of a really tragic order were called into requisition. Signor Nicolini (Romeo) performed his part in the style well known to habitués of the Italian opera. If his voice proved still too rebellious for the restraints necessary to express tender feeling, it promptly responded to the call of robust passion. M. Dufriche (Capuletto), who made his début on this occasion, enacted his part with dignity. His naturally good voice is not free from the injurious vibrato of the French school; nevertheless, he sang like a practised artist. In the air, "Su baldi garzon," he secured the approbation of the audience. It is pleasant to record that Mdlle Guercia (Stefano), recovered from the stage fright that marred her efforts a few nights back in Siebel, gave on Friday a pleasant and effective reading of the Page's music. Mdme Corsi impersonated the Nurse. Signors Cotogni (Mercuzio), De Reszke (Frate Lorenzo), Sabater (Tebaldo), and Raguer (Il Conte Pari) were all efficient. Signor Bevignani conducted with the ease of an accomplished master, accompanying the voices with judgment and bringing out the characteristics of Gounod's orchestration with tact and effect.

On Saturday the opera was Carmen, then played for the first time at Covent Garden; that establishment being still satisfied, as in the days when Faust was a novelty, to follow the track of Mr Mapleson and pick up his successes. A large and fashionable audience was assembled, but it was not exclusively, or even chiefly, on account of Bizet's opera that "society" gathered in strength. Carmen is, no doubt, an admired work, and an executant representative of that which Richard Wagner, speaking at the Bayreuth supper in 1870, graciously acknowledged to be an art suited to French taste. But Saturday's audience were drawn together by a form of attraction than which nothing has more power over the frequenters of Italian opera. The "sweet compulsion" was that of a prima donna; more, it was that of a prima donna not seen on our stage for ten years; more still, it was that of Pauline Lucca, once the spoilt child of Covent Garden, whose very faults were admired for the charming insouciance with which they were committed. Our public never cherished ill-feeling against their old favourite for her desertion of them ten years ago. They missed a saucy Cherubino, a picturesque and impulsive Selika, and the most tempting Zerlina that ever made Fra Diavolo's brigands open wide their eyes. But it was quite in Mdme Lucca's line to carry her artistic waywardness over into actual life, and the chances were that she would return as suddenly as she disappeared. Meanwhile nobody forgot her, and on Saturday night she came to find the impress left in 1872 still existing, comparatively unaffected by lapse of time and the rise of newer favourites. That Mdme Lucca was greeted with prolonged applause will be taken as a matter of course. An English audience never forgets and never ceases to be generous. There are those who say that it is not critical, and imply a want of power to judge. It is rather soft-hearted whenever a good intent can be descried, and, no less, whenever there come up from the past recollections of service done and pleasure conferred. Who does not prefer this magnanimity to the savage hardness which in some other countries is cherished as a proof of artistic discernment? Mdme Lucca was expected to make a "hit" as the Spanish gipsy, and that not merely on the strength of what she had done in the rôle elsewhere. No one acquainted with her special qualifications for dealing with character parts could doubt that she would find in Carmen a success ready to hand. The gipsy might have been taken from Merrimée's novel and placed on the stage expressly for her, whose artistic individuality it fits "like a glove." In working out her conception of the part Mdme Lucca does not shrink from realism for the purpose of making things pleasant. She might represent Carmen as simply a nature animated and guided by instinct; now attracted in this direction and now in that, as a butterfly amid flowers, all the time careless of inflicting pain. We have such a Carmen on our stage—rough, hoydendish, using the power of beauty with enjoyment of the wounds inflicted, yet not wilfully bad, nor altogether heartless. This, however, is not the Carmen of Mdme Lucca, who, taking the broadest view of Merrimée's conception, makes her a very tigress, with cruel claws ready to dart forth and rend and tear on the smallest provocation. The Russian, according to Napoleon, must be scratched before the Tartar can be discovered; but the slightest brush the wrong way turns our fascinating gipsy into a fiend. Madame Lucca takes care that this shall be seen, almost as soon as she comes upon the stage, in the furtive vindictive glance, and in the hard set expression that falls like a cloud of night upon the whilom smiling face. We, therefore, are not at all surprised to hear that Carmen has stabbed one of her fellow-workers. Such an act seems as natural as, when Don José afterwards pesters her with his love, is the wandering of the hand to the knife stuck in her girdle. The same couching fierceness runs through the entire course of the character, and more than the sensuousness which passes with Carmen for love, puts upon it a distinguishing stamp. Mdme Lucca worked out her idea with consummate skill and abiding strength. No detail was wanting, nor did the outline ever lose its clearness. Even when Carmen set herself to allure the young soldier from honour and duty the lurking devil could be seen through the thin disguise she wore; and how, when Don José wavered, that disguise vanished as if by magic, while out burst a torrent of passion, chafing itself hotter by a sense of its impotence. If at any time better than another Mdme Lucca was so in the final scene, where the gipsy at last stands face to face with the spirit of revenge she has challenged. Her bye-play while Don José poured forth his complaints and entreaties was a study, and showed, better than words could do, the varying emotions felt. Now rage distorted the gipsy's handsome face, succeeded by an expression of unutterable boredom at having to witness agony to her incomprehensible. Then came scorn, defiance, pride, as the plaudits of the bull-ring bespoke the triumph of Escamillo; and, lastly, despair on seeing that the time of reckoning had come. The lyric stage has not often witnessed anything more elaborate and, at the same time, more powerful than this; but, indeed, the entire impersonation was a dramatic success which ought to and will rank among the events of the season. When we say that Mdme Lucca has come back to us with her voice and vocal powers but little, if at all, changed, it will be at once understood how she rendered the music of her part. Nothing of emphasis and significance was wanting, but the lady's triumph was mainly that of the actress, and as such her audience recognized it. Referring to the performance as a whole, we cannot for a moment compare it favourably with that given at Her Majesty's Theatre under Sir Michael Costa, although the pure and graceful part of Micäela was taken by the same artist (Mdme Valleria), who then played it so charmingly as to win universal admiration. M. Bouhy, said to be the "creator" of Escamillo, looked well, but failed to give the character any special importance either as actor or singer, even the Torreador Song passing without a demand for repetition. As Don José, M. Lestellier showed himself in the light of a respectable, if not an uncommon artist, and made a more favourable impression than at any previous time. His acting in the final scene was not without power, but he had to contend against recollections which may have indisposed the audience fully to acknowledge his just deserts. Mdlle Velmi, (Mercedes) and Mdlle Lonati (Pasquita) were quite indifferent, while it is not possible to speak with more than ordinary commendation of Signor Silvestri (Zuniga), M. Dauphin (Dancairo), and Signor Guerini, whose make-up as Il Remendado seemed to have been borrowed from the stage of opéra-bouffe. The chorus did their work well, as usual, but M. Dupont may be advised to practise his orchestra further in the delicate and piquant treatment demanded by Bizet's characteristic music. He should also correct some of his tempi, and in particular avoid spoiling the opening, the quintet, and one or two other movements, by taking them at undue speed.—D. T.

The Princess Louise (Marchioness of Lorne) left England for Canada on Thursday, the 25th May. Her Royal Highness's departure will be much regretted by many musicians and painters, in both of which arts the Princess feels so deeply interested. Her Royal Highness was accompanied to the station by the Prince and Princess of Wales, the Duke of Edinburgh, the Duke of Cambridge, &c. Among those who received telegrams to meet the Princess at the Euston Station to bid her farewell were the Misses Montalba and Professor Goldberg.

PARSIFALIANA.

II.

The first two questions which present themselves on taking up the poem or the pianoforte score of Parsifal, are: (1) Why has Wagner entitled his work "Ein Bühnenweihfestspiel?" and (2) why does he call his hero "Parsifal" rather than "Parzival," as von Eschenbach has done? The second is easier to answer than the first; but, premising that my aim is quite as much to elicit as to impart information, I will try to answer both.

I. The literal English equivalent of "Ein Bühnenweihfestspiel," I take it, would be "A Sacred Festival Stage Play," or, as we should say more simply, "A Sacred Musical Drama." Regarded in this light, its analogy to the Mysteries and Miracle Plays of mediæval times, as well as to the Ammergau Passion Play of a more recent date, is at once apparent. By many the Ammergau Passion Play has been regarded as an offence, but by far the greater majority, who attended it in a proper and religious frame of mind, it has been pronounced to be in the highest degree an elevating spectacle. Thus it doubtless will be with Parsifal. The unthinking and irreligious will regard it simply as a musical dramatic spectacle. Religious people will find in it much which at first cannot but seem repulsive, but the objection to which will easily wear off, always provided that they approach it in a proper spirit, and in the same frame of mind as they would the Ammergau Passion Play. Attending the one as well as the other should be regarded as a sort of pilgrimage or religious function. For, according to Wagner, the dramatic stage is to become the great religious teacher and moralizer of the future, just as it was in the days of ancient Greece.

II. The second question—Why does Wagner call his hero "Parsifal" rather than "Parzival?"—is something more than an etymological one. In each of the various versions of the story of the life and adventures of the same knight his name is somewhat differently spelt; for this varied etymology there is good reason. In the prose romance (Roman de Perceval) by Chretien de Troyes, written before 1200 and rendered into verse by Menessier, he is called "Perceval." Here the word is derived from Per=a dish or basin, and Keval (cyfaill)=seeker; i.e., Seeker of the Grail. It is therefore synonymous with "Peredur"—Per and Gedur (seeker), the g being dropped when compounded with another word—the name by which the same knight is known in the Mabinogion of Wales, translated by Lady Charlotte Guest. In von Eschenbach's poem the word bears quite another signification; viz.; that of "Right through" (inmitten durch), as appears therein from Sigune's address to the hero:—

"Fürwahr, der heissest Parzival!
Der Name sagt: Inmitten durch."

This is analogous to "Perceforest," the hero of a prose romance in Greek, which was turned into Latin, and thence into French, under the title of La très Elégante Délicieuse Mellifleur et Très Plaisante Histoire du Très Noble Roy Perceforest (printed at Paris in 1528), who was so-called because he dared to pierce, almost alone, an enchanted forest, where women and children were most evilly entreated.

The earliest writer about the "Holy Grail" appears to have been one Flegetanis, an astrologer, whose manuscript, written in Arabic, was discovered in Toledo by Kiot (Guiot), and furnished the groundwork of subsequent accounts. Though no mention of Parzival, Titurel, and other Knights of the Grail, who appear in von Eschenbach's version, is made therein, it was doubtless the existence of this Arabic manuscript which led Wagner to call his hero "Parsifal," rather than "Parzival," or "Perceval," in order that it might agree with the Arabic etymology. "Parsifal," it should be explained, is equivalent to "Fal parsi," or more correctly, "Parseh fal"; its signification in either case being "pure fool." Regarding the story of the "Holy Grail" as a heathen myth Christianized (as many commentators have done), the pertinence of the preference for "Parsifal" to "Parzival" at once becomes apparent. Not only does it serve Wagner's dramatic purpose better, but from a religious point of view it gains greatly in beauty. "Parzival" or "Perceval," the "thorough" knight, or "Seeker for the Grail," as "Parsifal" is allegorical of a Christian giving up everything in order to be admitted a Priest and King in the City of God, and, in accordance with St Paul's dictum,* becoming a fool, in order to learn true wisdom.

More courageous than Southey, who stopped short in the middle of Tristan (see his edition of Morte Arthure, reprinted in black letter, after Caxton, and the notes to which are worth perusal), I waded through it to the bitter end, and was not rewarded for my pains—or what Southey calls "serious expense of time."—Otto Heard.]

In what is this entire phenomenon more clear, in what is it more perceptible than in almost anything else, than in the works of a musician of Jewish descent, endowed by nature with specifically musical gifts, as few musicians before him had been endowed! Everything which we perceived when investigating our antipathy for the Jewish element, every contradiction in that element, both as regards itself and us, all the incapacity of it, standing beyond the ground on which we stand, but wishing, notwithstanding, to hold intercourse with us on that ground, nay, even to give further development to the phenomena sprung therefrom, rise to the height of a perfectly tragic conflict in the nature, the life, and the artistic efforts of Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, who died so young. Mendelssohn showed us that a Jew may be most richly endowed with an abundance of specific talent, may enjoy the most liberal and most varied education, and may possess the highest and most delicately sensitive feeling of honour, without, by the aid of all these advantages, having it in his power to produce upon us, in one single instance, the profound impression, moving heart and soul, which we expect from art, because we know the latter to be capable of it, because we have, on innumerable occasions, experienced such a sensation, immediately a hero of that art merely opened his lips, so to speak, to address us. To professional critics, who may have arrived at the same convictions as ourselves on this point, we will leave the task of corroborating, from the details of Mendelssohn's artistic productions, this undoubtedly certain fact; let it now suffice to render clear our general feeling, for us to recall to mind that, on hearing anything by this composer, we felt our attention rivetted only when our fancy, desirous, more or less, of being merely entertained, was excited by the presentation, arrangement, and combination, of the most delicate, the smoothest, and the most skilful figures, as in the changing and charming forms and colours of the kaleidoscope—but never when these figures were intended to assume the shapes of the deep and vigorous sensations of the human heart.† In the latter case, even all formal power of production failed Mendelssohn, and on this account, especially when, as in oratorio, he approached the drama, he was compelled to grasp at every detail of form especially peculiar, as an individually characteristic mark, to one or other of his predecessors, whom he selected as his model in style. It is, moreover, a characteristic fact that, while pursuing this course, he should select as a model to be imitated, for his modern speech, incapable of expressing anything, no other than our old master Bach. Bach's musical language was formed at a period of our musical history when universal musical language was still struggling for the capability of more individual, and more certain, utterance; the exclusively formal and pedantic element still clung so closely to it, that it was first in Bach's works, thanks to the immense power of Bach's genius, that its purely human expression overcame the difficulties in its way. Bach's language holds the same relation to the language of Mozart, and, finally, to that of Beethoven, as the Egyptian Sphinx to a Grecian statue of a human being; as the Sphinx, though possessing a human face, emerges from the body of an animal, so does Bach's noble human head peer forth from beneath a peruque. An inconceivably thoughtless confusion in the luxurious musical taste of our time is to be found in the fact that we allow the language of Bach to be employed in addressing us at the very same moment as that of Beethoven, and that we delude ourselves into the idea that there was only an individually formal, but by no means a real and historical difference. The reason is, however, easily perceptible: the language of Beethoven can be spoken only by a perfect and thorough man of warm feelings, because it was the language of so perfect a musical being that, in obedience to the impulse of necessity he pointed out to us the road for the fructification of all arts by means of music as the sole successful mode of extending the latter. The language of Bach, on the other hand, can be easily repeated, though not in the sense of Bach, by a very skilful musician, because the formal element is still the preponderating element, the purely human expression not yet being so decidedly supreme that simply the What could or ought to be already uttered in it, since it was still engaged in the fashioning of the How. It is by Mendelssohn's endeavours to utter an obscure and almost negative purport in as interesting and mind-dazzling a mode as possible that the looseness and capriciousness of our musical style were carried to their highest pitch, if not actually originated. While Beethoven, the last in the series of our true musical heroes, struggled, with the highest aspirations and miracle-working power to achieve the clearest and the most certain expression of an unspeakable purport, by sharply-defined plastic fashioning of his tone-pictures, Mendelssohn, on the other hand, in his productions, reduces these pictures, all ready to his hand, to mere undefined shadows, on beholding the undecided glimmer of the colours composing which our capricious power of imagination is arbitrarily moved, but our purely human inward yearning for clear artistic vision scarcely encouraged with even the mere hope of realization. It is only when the oppressive feeling of his incapability appears to obtain the mastery over his mind, and forces him to the expression of gentle and melancholy resignation, that Mendelssohn is able to present himself to us characteristically, that is, in the subjective sense of a delicately feeling individuality, confessing, to itself, in the presence of impossibility, its own powerlessness. This is, as we said, the tragical trait in Mendelssohn's case; and if, in the sphere of art, we wished to bestow our sympathy upon mere individuality, we could not refuse Mendelssohn a large share of it, even though its force might be weakened by the consideration that this tragical element in his position clung to him, without his having a real, painful, purifying consciousness of the fact.

But no other Jewish composer can excite such sympathy in us. A widely celebrated one of our own times has appealed with his productions to a portion of our public, in whom he had not so much to spoil all musical taste, as to take advantage of a taste already corrupted. It is now a long time since, having proceeded by degrees, the public of our operahouses left off making those demands which they were entitled to make, not merely upon a dramatic work of art, but upon any work generally, which possessed a claim to good taste. These places of entertainment are mostly filled only with that part of our middle classes, with whom the sole motive for taking up one occupation after another is weariness; the disease of weariness is not, however, to be cured by the enjoyment derived from art, for it cannot be intentionally diverted, but merely deceived with regard to itself by another kind of weariness. The means of thus deceiving it has been made by the celebrated composer in question the study of his professional life. It is useless to characterize precisely the artistic resources which he employed with such profusion to attain the said object; it is sufficient that, as we perceive by the result, he understood perfectly how to deceive, and he did so by imposing on his wearied audiences‡ with the jargon we have already minutely described, as the piquant modern expression of all the trivialities with which, in their natural absurdity, they had so often been presented before. That he should, also, have attached importance to great mental commotions, and likewise to the effect produced by interweaving catastrophes of the feelings, is a fact that ought to astonish no one who knows how necessarily such effects are desired by persons suffering from weariness; that he succeeds in his design, ought to surprise no one who recollects the reasons why, under the circumstances, he must succeed in everything. This deceptive composer even goes so far as to deceive himself, doing so, too, as intentionally, perhaps, as he deceives his wearied audiences. We really believe that he would like to produce works of art, while, at the same time, he knows that he cannot produce them; to extricate himself from this painful conflict between will and capability, he writes operas for Paris, and then easily gets them performed in other parts of the world—now-a-days the most certain method of achieving an artistic reputation without being an artist. Under the yoke of this self-delusion, which is not, possibly, so light as might be supposed, he, also, appears to us in an almost tragical light; the purely personal element in his wounded feelings, however, renders the matter tragi-comical, just as, generally, a something which leaves us cold, and is really laughable, is the characterizing mark of Judaism as regards that class of artistic manifestations in which the celebrated composer shows himself with regard to music.

From a careful consideration of the facts adduced, and which we have been enabled to comprehend by the investigation and justification of our invincible antipathy to the Jewish nature, the one thing especially apparent is the incapability of our epoch in musical art. Had the two Jewish composers of whom we have thus spoken at length really brought our music to higher excellence,§ we should † Concerning the new Jewish system which has been raised upon this quality of Mendelssohn's music, and for the justification of this artistic agreement, we shall speak further on.

‡ Whoever has observed the shameless listlessness and indifference of a Jewish congregation during the celebration of their musical service in the synagogue, will be able to comprehend why a Jewish operatic composer does not feel at all hurt on meeting with the same phenomenon in the theatrical public, and is able to continue working indefatigably for that public, as the phenomenon in question must strike him as less unbecoming at a theatrical performance than in the house of God.

§ Another characteristic fact is the position assumed by the other Jewish musicians, and, indeed, by educated Judaism generally, towards their two most celebrated composers. For the partisans of Mendelssohn the famous operatic composer in question is an object of horror; with a delicate senti-have been compelled to admit simply that the fact of our remaining behind them resulted from some organic incapacity to which we had fallen victims; but such is not the case; on the contrary, it is evident that, in comparison with by-gone periods of art, individual purely musical power has increased rather than diminished. The incapacity exists in the spirit of our art itself which demands a different life to that artificial life which is with difficulty sustained for it. The incapacity of this kind of music itself is displayed to us in the artistic labours of Mendelssohn, the specifically and unusually gifted musician; the nothingness of the entire public, its utterly inartistic nature and desires, are most evident and clear from the successes of the celebrated Jewish operatic composer we have mentioned. These are the important points to which the attention of every one who cultivates art seriously should be now seriously directed; on these points we have to investigate, to interrogate ourselves, and to come to a clear understanding. Any one who shirks the trouble, any one who turns from such an investigation because he is not imperatively impelled thereto, or because he avoids the knowledge which might probably drive him out of the groove of an old system, devoid of thought and of feeling—any one who would act thus we include under the category of "Judaism in Music." The Jews could not master this art before it was requisite to exhibit in it precisely what they have demonstrably shown: its inward incapacity to live. As long as music, as a separate art, contained within itself a real and organic necessity for life, down to the time of Mozart and of Beethoven, there was not a single Jewish composer; it was impossible for an element entirely foreign to such a vital organization to take part in the conformations of such a life. It is not till a body is evidently dead within that the elements lying outside are able to obtain possession of, or merely to decompose it; then, it is true, the flesh of such a body is resolved into a swarming, multiple, life of worms; yet who, on beholding these latter, would say that the body itself was still alive? The spirit, that is: life, fled from the body to something with which it has affinity, and that is simply life itself; it is only in real life that we can again find the spirit of art, and not in its worm-devoured corpse.

I have said previously that the Jews have produced no true poet. This is the place to speak of Heinrich Heine. At the time when Goethe and Schiller were writing poetry among us, we know of no Jew who did so; at the time, however, when writing poetry among us became a lie, and everything, save a true poet, sprang from the completely unpoetic element of our life, it was the office of a highly-gifted poetizing Jew to expose, with irresistible raillery, this lie, this utter nullity and Jesuitical hypocrisy of our poetizing, which still endeavoured to pass itself off for poetry. He lashed mercilessly the musical celebrities of his own race, as well as other persons, for their pretence of being artists; no falsehood escaped his attacks; he was incessantly urged forward by the pitiless demon who denied everything that appeared to merit being denied, through all the illusions of modern self-deception, so far as to deceive himself by considering that he, too, was a poet, for which he had his poetic lies set to music by our composers.—He was the conscience of Judaism, just as Judaism is the evil conscience of modern civilization.

We have still to mention another Jew who appeared among us as a writer. He stepped out of his isolated position as a Jew to seek salvation among us; he did not find it, and was doomed to become convinced that he could find it only with the redemption which should render us, also, really men. To become a man in common with us is, however, for the Jew, tantamount, above all, to ceasing to be a Jew. Börne did this. But it is precisely Börne who has proved that this deliverance cannot be achieved with ease and with carelessly cold comfort, but that it cost him, like us, sweat, distress, anxiety, and a large amount of suffering and pain. Take part, without consideration of the consequences, in this work of redemption, bearing fresh offspring through self-destruction, and we are united and undistinguishable! But remember that there is only one means of redemption from the curse that weighs upon you, namely: Annihilation!

CONCERTS.

EVEN amid the thousand-and-one strong attractions of the present musical season interest was felt in the performance at St James's Hall, last Thursday night, of Mr F. H. Cowen's cantata, St Ursula, and a large number of amateurs gathered to hear and judge the work. St Ursula, as must be well remembered, was written for and produced at the Norwich Festival of 1881, but had never, previous to the occasion under notice, challenged the criticism of the metropolis. It underwent an ordeal, therefore, on Thursday, and we are bound to add, judging by the measures of applause bestowed, that it did so with gratifying success. The cantata was very fully noticed in our columns at the time of its Festival hearing, little more than six months ago. We then dwelt at length upon Mr R. E. Francillon's poetic version of the story of the legendary saint and her virgins; whose bones travellers on the Rhine may yet behold if they have faith to believe. The opinion then expressed upon its merits remains unchanged, and needs no repetition beyond this—when composing his poem Mr Francillon showed himself as heedless as most other librettists of the immense advantage which a composer derives from variety of rhythm. The monotony of the measure he has employed is a serious drawback even to the cantata as it stands, for though Mr Cowen made the best of the verses with which he was supplied, it was not in the nature of things that the difficulty should altogether be overcome. With regard to the music, further acquaintance increases the respect felt from the first towards an exceedingly earnest and painstaking effort. We cannot too highly commend the spirit of thoroughness shown in every number of the work; nor can we over-praise the evident desire to get out of the beaten track into a less trodden way. The spirit of thoroughness is always good, and we are happy to know that it increasingly characterises our young English composers; but the desire to strike out new paths, or to follow the foot-tracks of some pioneer genius may lead to danger unless exercised with caution. It is, at all events, certain that never in art can anything be gained by imitation when it involves a departure from the method and style which early preference and the force of education have made natural. A composer may transform himself, as Beethoven did, till the work done at fifty differs entirely from that produced at twenty. But Beethoven's transformation came from within, and was the reverse of that which happens when a man, by long contemplation of another, is "changed into the same image." It is ever best, we may depend upon it, not only for a composer to go into himself in search of ideas, but to follow the method of expression which comes most naturally to him. Between the thought and its proper utterance a subtle connection exists, which should always be, yet rarely is, recognized. Given the one, the other is not far off. Often, however, they are rudely separated by an exercise of will or whim, and the natural idea comes forth clothed in an artificial dress, to the injury of its effect, if not to the total loss of its power. All this was illustrated, we think, by the performance on Thursday night, first of St Ursula and next of the "Scandinavian" symphony, both from the same pen, and, as regards birth period, almost twin productions. In the cantata, with its "representative themes;" its frequent subordination of vocal to orchestral effects; its erratic harmonies, ever turning and twisting in unexpected directions, and its general air of unrest, we see Mr Cowen looking intently at Wagner, by him shaping the expression of thoughts which are not Wagnerian. But in the "Scandinavian" symphony we have Mr Cowen telling his own story in his own way. Idea and utterance are here one. A beautiful sense of unity prevails, and the result is strength—strength sufficient to carry the work to some of the most musical cities of the continent and bring it back laurel-crowned. The moral is obvious, and for the sake of the art which Mr Cowen, by his many and great gifts, is able to adorn, we trust he will never again be tempted aside by the fantastic paraphernalia of Wagnerism; even though, in so doing, he gain the sweet voices of a superfine circle. Those were attractive meadows through which Christian passed under the shadow of Doubting Castle, and into the grasp of Giant Despair. The performance, both of the cantata and the symphony, was not so good as might have been wished, orchestra and chorus equally failing. On the other hand, the vocal solos entrusted to Mdme Valleria, Miss Orridge, Mr Lloyd, and Mr King, were generally well delivered; Mr Lloyd carrying off honours by gaining an encore for the graceful song, "The river sings, the river flows." Mdme Valleria's operatic training enabled her to present Ursula's music in its most dramatic form; and now that this clever lady has appeared ment of honour they feel how much he compromises Judaism, as far as the more accomplished musician is concerned, and are, therefore, without pity for him. The faction of the other composer is, on the contrary, far more cautious in what they say about Mendelssohn, contemplating with envy rather than with open ill-will the success he has achieved in the world of "more sterling" music. It is the manifest object of a third party, that of those Jews who still go on composing, to avoid anything like scandal among themselves, in order to avoid all exposure, so that their process of producing music may proceed without any painful disturbances; the successes, which cannot be denied, of the great operatic composer are, therefore, in their opinion, worthy of consideration, and they think there must be something in what he does, though there is a good deal which they cannot approve or pronounce "solid." In fact, the Jews are far too clever not to know how matters stand with them.

on what may be called the oratorio platform, we trust she will remain there, a valuable addition to the brief list of English-speaking sopranos. Miss Orridge sang the contralto music artistically. How Mr Cowen, who conducted his own works, was applauded is easy to imagine. The verdict of the audience was all in his favour, and he will, doubtless, take courage from it, pressing on to yet higher things.—D. T.

Floral Hall.—A concert at the Floral Hall, with the Covent Garden company, was rendered more than usually interesting by the presence of Mdme Christine Nilsson and the Royal Amateur Orchestral Society, with the Duke of Edinburgh in a prominent and responsible position. The performance, in aid of the funds of the Royal College of Music, was under the immediate patronage of their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales and other members of the Royal family, whose labours have been and are being so freely devoted to the establishment of this institution. The programme was particularly well chosen, and both parts began appropriately enough with works by English composers—Sterndale Bennett's fantasia overture, Paradise and the Peri, and Mr Arthur Sullivan's incidental music to The Merchant of Venice. Both are too well known to amateurs to require new words of praise. If in the proposed school musicians are educated able to add worthily to the list of English orchestral productions, among which this overture and the Masque music hold high place, lasting thanks will be due to those by whose efforts the institution has been founded. These and the other two contributions of the Amateur Society—Beethoven's Leonora Overture (No. 3) and Weber's overture to Der Freischütz—were played both with precision and thorough appreciation. Signor de Reszké opened the vocal part of the concert with an admirable rendering of a romance called "Povera Rondinella"; Mdme Trebelli followed with Blumenthal's romantic and poetical Hungarian air, "Catene di Rose"; and Signor Mierzwinsky gave with dramatic power and much sensibility a scena from Massenet's Herodiade. Mdme Albani's "Ah! fors' è lui" was a natural consequence of the remarkable success of her recent performance of Violetta at Covent Garden, which it fully confirmed. After Beethoven's overture Mdme Nilsson sang first Braga's serenade, "O quali mi risvegliano," with violin obbligato by the Duke of Edinburgh, and subsequently a couple of those characteristic Swedish melodies which the Swedish prima donna sings with such spirit and so charmingly. His Royal Highness was evidently somewhat nervous at the beginning of his task; but when this natural feeling was conquered, he played altogether admirably, both here and subsequently in the obbligato to Mdme Albani's exquisite delivery of John Sebastian Bach-Gounod's "Ave Maria." There is no royal road to success as a musician, except diligent practice and the earnest cultivation and development of musical sentiment; but this road the Duke has traversed with completely successful results. His tone is remarkably pure, his phrasing artistic in a high degree, and in these accompaniments he exhibited the great and rare merit of being in perfect sympathy with the singer. It is well for a Musical College whose patrons are thus skilled in the art they seek to advance. The only other song was M. Bouhy's, an air from Nicolo Isouard's Joconde, with the familiar refrain, "Et l'on revient toujours à ses premiers amours."—D. L. R.

Crystal Palace.—Herr Anton Rubinstein had earned for himself, by force of his symphony denominated Ocean, the reputation of being the composer of the longest known work of the kind ever produced. But, apparently unsatisfied with the ramifications of this "mighty monster," he has lately deemed it expedient to add to it another movement—the seventh—called The Storm, and this was performed for the first time in England at the twenty-second Saturday Concert. People might have imagined that one of the very first thoughts in his mind would be that of depicting a tempest; but Herr Rubinstein has only recently conceived such an episode to be at all pertinent. We do not think the Moldavian composer has done himself justice in The Storm, save as a writer for the big drum, in which respect he distances all rivals. Beethoven gave us a marvellous storm scene in his Pastoral Symphony, and Mendelssohn has left one of scarcely inferior grandeur in his "Scotch" Symphony. There is music in both of these, however, whereas in Herr Rubinstein's there is little else but noise and confusion. A passage from Rigoletto, where the flute imitates the irregular outline of a flash of forked lightning, has evidently lingered in his memory. On the whole, it is to be hoped that when next The Ocean is performed Mr Manns will adopt the fair-weather version and exclude the storm. Mdlle Vera Timanoff played Liszt's flimsy fantasia for pianoforte and orchestra on themes from Beethoven's Ruins of Athens with considerable facility of execution, and, later on, contributed other pieces for pianoforte (unaccompanied) by Rubinstein and Liszt. The vocalists were the Misses Robertson, and the opening and concluding overtures were Gluck's Iphigenia in Aulis (with Wagner's Coda), and Arthur Sullivan's charming overture, Di Ballo.

Musical Artists' Society.—The object of this society, which exists for the production of new compositions, was well served on Saturday night, when a number of works were performed in the concert room of the Royal Academy of Music. Among the more important were a pianoforte trio in B flat, by Mr Alfred Gilbert, the interesting string quartet with which Mr C. E. Stephens carried off the first prize in a competition arranged by the Academical Board of Trinity College, London, and a pianoforte quintet in C, the work of Mr Algernon Ashton, whose earnest labours in the department of chamber music we have more than once noticed. The quintet, which was written about three years ago, exemplifies certain of the faults of youth in the boldness of its treatment and the excess of its effusiveness. It is, however, not prolix, nor does it strain the classic form which, we are glad to see, Mr Ashton always observes. The opening allegro shows considerable independence of idea, and no small degree of power; but the romance (andante cantabile) excites greater pleasure at first hearing, the scherzo, in this respect, coming not far behind. That the work generally evinces a happy musical faculty is beyond question, and, no doubt, its young author will learn in time that effect does not always depend on elaboration, and that there is often a good deal of beauty in repose of manner. Mr Ashton may be encouraged to go on. There is good stuff in him. In the performance of the quintet he was assisted by Messrs Buziau, Schneider, Blagrove, and Reed.—D. T.

Floral Hall.—The first concert of the season took place on Saturday afternoon, in the annex of the Royal Italian Opera-house, some of the principal artists associated with that establishment contributing a varied and attractive programme. Among prominent features was the fine singing of Mdme Albani, who gave "Souvenir de' miei prim' anni" (from Herold's Pré aux Clercs) with the same vocal brilliancy and charm as on the stage performances in the opera. To these the gifted prima donna added Widor's "Nuit d'Etoiles" and the ballad "Robin Adair," being encored in the first and last of her performances. The important violin obbligato in Herold's aria was finely rendered by Mr Carrodus, who also played, with admirably finished taste and execution, Vieuxtemps' well-known Rêverie. Mdme Sembrich's cultivated powers were favourably exhibited in the bravura air, "Che pur aspro" (from Mozart's Il Seraglio), and in two German Lieder. Other vocal pieces were contributed by Mesdames Fursch-Madi, Ghiotti, Stahl, and Desvignes; MM. Mierzwinsky, De Reszké, Massart, Gailhard, Gresse, and Devries, the opera chorus, occasionally co-operating. Sir J. Benedict, Signors Bevignani and Bisaccia were the conductors.

A concert was given at the Poplar Town Hall on Tuesday, May 30th. The singers were Miss Clara Dowle, of the Guildhall School of Music, Messrs E. W. Giles and Edward Shale; the instrumentalists, Mr Percy Jackman (pianoforte), and Mr Stout (violin). Miss Dowle gave "It was a dream" (Cowen), "A little mountain lad," and "I cannot say good bye" (Roeckel), each being enthusiastically encored. Mr E. W. Giles sang Knowles' "Wrecked and saved," Blewitt's "Little fat grey man," and Watson's "Powder monkey" (encored). Mr Edward Shale contributed "Tell me, Mary, how to woo thee" (Hodson), "Come into the garden, Maud" (Balfe), and "Once again" (Sullivan). Mr J. T. Stout's solos on the violin, and Mr Percy Jackman's on the pianoforte, were well played and much applauded.

Mr Edwin Holland, the esteemed professor of singing, gave his annual concert on Wednesday evening at the Royal Academy of Music. The programme was made up chiefly of songs by modern composers, among the most successful being Meyerbeer's "Nobil Signor" (Les Huguenots), sung, in the original key, with charming naïveté, by Mdme Rose Hersee; Arditi's valse, "L'Estasi," by Miss Eleanor Farnol; "Quando le sere," by Mr Maas; and Pinsuti's "Bedouin's love song," by Mr Albert McGuckin (a young and promising barytone, brother to Mr Barton McGuckin). Mr Holland gave the aria "O casto fior," from Massenet's Roi de Lahore, and joined Mr Albert McGuckin, Misses Ada Collin and Farnol in Pinsuti's quartet, "Good night." Several of Mr Holland's pupils were introduced to exhibit his effective teaching, and the programme was varied by Signor Tito Mattei playing a melodie varié, "Espoir," and a new "Walz-Galop," both of his own composition, Miss Arthur and Signor Li Calsi contributing a fantasia on airs from I Puritani, arranged as a duet for two pianofortes. The stereotyped "calls" were awarded to all the artists.

Mr Pollitzer.—An interesting concert was recently given in Steinway Hall by Mr A. Pollitzer, of whom it cannot be necessary to say that he is a resident violinist of high attainments and as high repute. The programme contained a strong infusion of the classic element. It began, with Schubert's always welcome quartet in D minor, last and greatest of the series of such works produced by that abundant labourer during his too short life. We may congratulate Mr Pollitzer, together with his talented associates,

Messrs Gibson, Jung, and Ould, upon the manner in which they discharged a task not to be lightly undertaken. The quartet is the very reverse of a trifle. It requires serious playing, such as the four artists above named gave it, in order that bare justice may be done. All the movements were well executed, but the palm fell to the rendering of the Andante con moto, which, as every amateur knows, is a set of variations upon the solemn theme of Schubert's own song, "Death and the Maiden." The variations were given with much taste, and made a great impression, applause at their close being long and loud. Mr Pollitzer subsequently introduced two violin solos—Spohr's well-known Scena Cantante ("Dramatic Concerto"—so called among us) and his own fantasia on themes from La Favorita. In the first-named piece the concert-giver proved worthy of his reputation. That he did justice to the passages of display will at once be assumed; but his rendering of the cavatina may have surprised some present by the grace and tenderness of its expression. In this movement Mr Pollitzer was certainly at his best, and so thought the audience, if we may attach any significance to the applause which followed. Other features of the concert were Haydn's Quartet in G (No. 6), three Impromptus for the Pianoforte, by Mr J. F. Barnett, extremely well played by Miss Emma Barnett, and songs sung by Misses Carlotta Elliott and Helen D'Alton. Mr Henry Parker accompanied, contributing no little to the success of Spohr's scena, by his performance of the orchestral part as arranged for piano.

A CONCERT was given by Mrs E. Mitchell at the Athenæum, Goldhawk Road, Shepherd's Bush, in aid of the funds of the West London Hospital, on Tuesday evening, the 9th May. The singers were Mdmes Frances Brooke, Osborne Williams, Isabelle Powers, and E. Mitchell; Signor Santo Arigoni, Messrs James Sauvage, A. F. Mills, Wakefield Reid and Tennyson Cole. The instrumentalists were Miss Mabel Bourne and Herr Lehmeyer (pianoforte), and Herr Polonaski (violin). We hope the issue of Mrs Mitchell's philanthropic undertaking resulted in a handsome contribution to the charity. The exertions of all concerned in the concert were evidently con amore, and general praise was awarded them. Mrs Mitchell's contributions were Braga's "Serenata" (violin obbligato, Mr L. Foster) and Claribel's "Come back to Erin." Mdme Isabelle Powers gave, among other songs, Handel's "Angels ever bright and fair" and Henry Smart's "Rhine Maiden"; Mdme Frances Brooke, Milton Wellings' "Some Day." Mdme Osborne Williams sang Watson's "Winter Story," and joined Mrs Brooke in Horn's "I know a bank." Herr Lehmeyer played Gottschalk's "Danse Osianic" and a "Chaconne" by Durand, Miss Mabel Bourne a "Nocturne and Valse" by Chopin, and Schumann's "Carneval." Herr Polonaski played violin solos by Vieuxtemps, Polonaski, and Wieniawski; and the concert, conducted by Mr J. H. G. Ross, satisfied everyone.

ORGAN RECITAL.—At All Saints', Stoke Newington, on Thursday, May 25th, there was a full choral service—Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis, in F (Tours); Anthem, "Send out Thy light" (Gounod)—followed by a "recital" by Mr Davan Wetton (organist of the church). The following is the programme:—

Sixth Sonata (Mendelssohn); Air varied, "Holsworthy Church Bells" (Wesley); Grand Fantasia, "The Storm" (Lemmens); Toccata in F (Bach); (a) Cantilène (Solomé), (b) Postlude (Wély); Allegretto Grazioso (Tours); Marche Pontificale (Lemmens).

MDME MONTIGNY-RÉMAURY arrived on Tuesday, and will play, this afternoon, Beethoven's early concerto in C major. The great French pianist might do worse than try on a future occasion Weber's first concerto, in the same key. She will be welcomed on all sides by genuine connoisseurs.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—Three programmes remain for hearing in connection with these concerts, and they are all full of interest. Next Thursday (June 8) will be performed the whole of Schumann's Scenen aus Göthe's Faust. This work is in three parts, of which the first and second illustrate well-known episodes in the life of the legendary Doctor; the third being devoted to the final and most mystical section of Goethe's philosophical drama. We believe that the whole of the scenes have never been given at a concert in England; and, looking at the character of the music, together with the unfading charm of the story, it may be expected that amateurs will largely avail themselves of an opportunity for which many have waited long. At the penultimate concert, June 15, Mdme Norman-Néruda will play Mendelssohn's violin concerto, and Mr Charles Hallé will conduct a performance of Berlioz's Harold en Italie. The series will end on June 22 with Beethoven's great Mass in D, soprano solos by Mdme Albani.

TO "AN ENGLISH MUSICIAN."

SIR,—When you write your next arrogant and impertinently high-handed letter, be careful, should you quote from a poet, that you quote him correctly.

"He was a mighty poet,
With subtle-soul'd psychology,"

is nonsense.

"He was a mighty poet,
And a subtle-soul'd psychologist," is sense, and these are the words of the writer. In regard to the remainder of your communication, it is all moonshine. True, the Bayreuth performances in 1876 received little or no support from the inhabitants of that city, no matter of what denomination (burghers included); but what has that to do with Wagner?—

Yours obediently,
FIAT JUSTITIA.

GERMAN OPERA AT DRURY LANE.—Now that the London public has been pretty well satiated with the Ring des Nibelungen at Her Majesty's Theatre, it is pleasant to turn to Drury Lane, where, though a great deal of Wagner is in store for us, we shall have to consider him under varied phases. Lohengrin, for instance, is a thing per se. The legend is as clear and simple as the story of the Sonnambula itself, wherein it so essentially differs from Tannhäuser, its immediate precursor, and so essentially agrees with Der Fliegende Holländer, the immediate precursor of Tannhäuser. In addition to these, we are promised Die Meistersinger and Tristan und Isolde, the former embodying Wagner's notion of a comic opera of the merriest and most boisterous, the latter his idea of a tragic opera of the deepest, the one as chaste and undefiled, no matter from what point of view its purely artistic merits may be adjudged, as the other, which Wagnerites quand même regard as the highest flight of their idol's genius, is the precise contrary. Both, however, will be heard with interest; and, indeed, anything that rids us of "All-Father Wotan" and his surroundings, will be welcome. Rienzi, Wagner's opera "after" (a long way after) Meyerbeer, is not to be vouchsafed to us; but its omission will hardly excite general consternation. Out of twenty-four performances no fewer than sixteen are devoted to Wagner, the remaining six comprising three representations of Weber's Euryanthe, and three of Beethoven's Fidelio. Mozart's enchanting Cosi fan tutti (a well of melody), originally contemplated, is abandoned at the eleventh hour—why, only Messrs Hermann Franke and Pollini, the spirited directors of the undertaking, can explain. Such an oasis in the wide Wagnerian desert would have been a veritable godsend. However, the series commenced successfully with a very fine performance of Lohengrin, under the direction of Herr Hans Richter, beyond comparison the best interpreter of Wagner's operas, and justly renowned as one of the foremost of living conductors. The four leading parts were admirably sustained by Mdme Rosa Sucher (Elsa), Mdme Joanna Garso-Dely (Ortrud), Dr Emil Kraus (Telramund), and Herr Hermann Winkelmann (Lohengrin), about whom—the first and last, the Elsa and the Lohengrin, especially—did space permit, a very great deal might be said. For the present, however, we must be content with a general verdict of unqualified approval. The audience, a very large one, was deeply impressed, but only gave vent to enthusiasm at the conclusion of each successive act. Almost identical criticism may apply to the performance of Der Fliegende Holländer, Wagner's first opera with a myth for its theme, and the very first with which the English people were made acquainted, at Drury Lane Theatre, where Mr Mapleson gave Italian opera (or "opera in Italian") in 1870. The leading parts in this work, so familiar to our public, thanks to Mr Carl Rosa, were admirably personated by Mdme Rosa Sucher and Herr E. Gura. The Senta of Mdme Sucher stands a very little way off perfection, and a more complete realization of the "Holländer" ("Vanderdecken," as we have been accustomed to style him), than that of Herr Gura could hardly be thought of. The scene in which the half-demented visionary maiden first confronts the long-absorbing object of her dreams, was enough to stamp the whole performance. It could not have been more forcibly presented. All the rest was good in every particular—thanks not only to the competent representation of more or less subordinate parts, but to Herr Richter and the orchestra he directs with such rare ability. Tannhäuser followed in due course, and, though not only an inferior opera, of much less wholesome tendency than the Fliegende Holländer, was received with equal enthusiasm—thanks to the general excellence of the performance. In the character of Elizabeth, the pure and devoted Princess, Mdme Rosa Sucher added another to the triumphs she had already achieved as Elsa and Senta. Here, indeed, we have a variously-gifted artist—for no three parts could have possibly so little in common, although all three, from different points of view, are disinterested and devoted women.—Graphic.

THE LATE FABIO CAMPANA.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—Your columns are ever open to appeals for help, and I have been requested to submit the following case for insertion in your journal:—The Cavaliere Fabio Campana, the well-known musical composer and teacher, who died very suddenly a short time since, left his English widow in very straitened circumstances. I am not, perhaps, exaggerating her position when I state that she has been left almost destitute, and this through no fault of her late husband, as he was working hard up to the very last. It is thought and hoped that not only the late maestro's many friends and numerous pupils, but a benevolent public generally—to whom his name must have been for more than a quarter of a century as "familiar as household words"—will respond to this appeal to aid his widow. I am instructed to state that the undermentioned ladies and gentlemen have formed themselves into a committee, for the purpose of raising a fund for Mdme Campana, and have kindly consented to receive donations. Any sum, however small, will be gratefully acknowledged by the member of the committee to whom it is sent, and information will be ultimately given to each donor of the manner in which the fund has been laid out on behalf of Mdme Campana.—I remain, yours faithfully,

F. C. HUGHES-HALLETT, Lieut.-Colonel,
(Hon. Sec.)

A LETTER FROM BUCHAREST.

DEAR MR DISHLEY PETERS.—I fear you and the subscribers of the Musical World will entirely forget that you once had a contributor whose feeble effusions were signed "B. R." and who had some unjustifiable pretensions as a pianist.* I had hoped by my energetic correspondence to keep myself under, at least, the eyes of those whose ears I have spared during the last six months, but at present so little of musical importance takes place in Bucharest that I have felt compelled to remain silent. However, if you will submit to miscellaneous news I may perhaps find something to interest you.

The Roumanians are somewhat alarmed at Herr Neumann's menace to unravel the mysteries of the Ring des Nibelungen to the Bucharest public, and many express doubts as to his success. The feeble Italian Opera Companies usually engaged "go down" more favourably here, and although the German population is somewhat large, they do not form a sufficiently wealthy portion of society to support so expensive an enterprise alone. In a country where politics are so inextricably mixed up with everything, it is needless to add that the fact of Herr Neumann and his company being German does not further conduce to their popularity. To the Roumanians, Germans and Austrians are the same thing, and the latter are held in a detestation which the recent discussions on the Danubian question naturally tend to increase.

The weather (if I may be pardoned mentioning so hackneyed a subject) visited on us lately leads to the belief that Saint Demetrius, the patron saint of Bucharest, is amusing himself at our expense. It is the custom, after long absence of rain, to appeal to this lofty personage, and the body of the respected saint is brought forth in a silver coffin and trotted through the town, accompanied by a procession of 300 priests and crowds of the believers. The emotion displayed by the crowd is most touching. I have not seen such an ebullition of feeling since I have been in the country. It has been maliciously observed that the glass is always very low on the day fixed by the ecclesiasticals for St Demetrius' promenade; as a matter of fact, since his last appearance in public, more than three weeks ago, it has scarcely left off raining, and the interests of the harvest demand a prompt cessation of his favours.

Last Monday, May 10th (old style), being the anniversary of the proclamation of Independence, the arrival of the present king in Bucharest, and his coronation last year, the occasion was celebrated by one of the brilliant fêtes in which Bucharest loves to indulge. The streets and squares were most tastefully decorated with festoons of leaves and flags, principally, of course, the red, blue, and yellow of Roumania; but here and there the tricolor of France was observed, while from the British and American Legations, and my own balcony, the Union Jack of Old England "waved proudly in the wind." At 6 o'clock in the morning the cannons announced the opening of a national festival, and the sun intimated his intention of being present, "positively for this occasion only," as he has not condescended to appear since. Although the Roumanians are by no means a religious people, nothing can be done without the formula of an ecclesiastical ceremony; consequently at 10 o'clock the unfortunate King and Queen, neither of whom belong to the orthodox Greek Church, were dragged off to join the deputies and foreign ministers at the Cathedral. The service concluded, their Majesties returned to the Boulevard to review the troops. Two handsome pavillions were erected, one for the Queen and her special friends, the second for the diplomatists and other favoured persons. Some very handsome dresses were worn, and I may remark, en parenthèse, that the Roumanian ladies would sell their souls (probably, often do) for dress, which is carried to a most alarming extent. The march past began with the juvenile military school, consisting of all the small boys in Bucharest, soldiers in embryo, or perhaps, to be more truthful, in caricature, as the uniforms were somewhat incomplete and the rifles sham ones. They raised a feeble shout at stated intervals, to which the King good-naturedly responded. The "Guard" National followed, and, I must say, they are a very shabby lot; their worst enemy could not say they were kept for ornament. The fact of their supplying their own uniforms may partly account for their unmartial appearance. Some of the line regiments looked very well, and the Artillery and Cavalry really did King Carol, who is an enthusiastic soldier, credit. What struck me very much was the absence of any demonstration on the part of the crowd; the Roumanians evidently have but little sympathy with kings and queens. Only once during the procession—when the recently discovered standard of Tudor Vladimiresco, a celebrated patriot of 1821, appeared—was there any exhibition of warmth. Before leaving the Boulevard, the Queen, who, besides being a most distinguished woman and talented scholar, is extremely amiable and engaging, walked towards a group of the wounded soldiers standing near, and addressed them a few kind words. A strange contrast, the refined, elegant woman, and the rough, weather-beaten peasants, some still wearing their stained uniform, others having resumed their peasant dress. At five o'clock the King assisted at the banquet in the Chaussée given to the wounded; the repast appeared to me a most unappetizing one, but it met with keen appreciation. His Majesty's health was drunk, and the King, before leaving, presented his own Order, the Cross of Roumania, to an aged veteran who had taken part in the War of 1821. The town was brilliantly illuminated in the evening; and not the least pleased amongst the crowd was our charming Queen, who drove through all the principal streets.

I am longing to hear some of the music of which you seem to have too much in London. Au revoir.—Yours most sincerely,

ELISE JONNESCO (BESSIE RICHARDS).

Bucharest, May.

[* The "feeble effusions" were singularly healthy, and the "unjustifiable pretensions" as singularly legitimate. Our fair communicator will, I feel persuaded, accept this "retort courteous" pacifically.—OTTO BEARD.]

On his return from his concert tour in Scandinavia and Denmark, Herr Hans von Bülow spent a few days at Berlin. It is reported that he will shortly marry Mdlle Schanzer, of the Ducal Theatre, Meiningen.

COLOGNE.—Not feeling at home in his new post as conductor at the Stadttheater, Hans Kössler, formerly director of the Dresden Liedertafel, has accepted a position on the staff of the Buda-Pesth Academy of Music.

BRUNSWICK.—At the conclusion of the present season, Franz Abt will resign the conductorship which he has held about thirty years at the Ducal Theatre. He thinks of residing permanently in Wiesbaden.

DRESDEN.—Dr Wüllner retires from the conductorship at the Theatre Royal. Like his predecessor, Krebs, he will henceforth conduct exclusively the music in the Roman Catholic Court-Church and the Symphony Concerts of the Royal band, remaining likewise, as heretofore, at the head of the Conservatory. E. Schuch succeeds him as operatic conductor.—The Nibelungen performances at the Residenztheater are fixed for the 8th, 9th, 11th, and 12th September. Director Neumann pays a rent of 1,200 marks a day, or the same sum forfeit money, should the performances, from any unforeseen cause, be found impracticable.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

At the Symphony Concert on June 8th, Schumann's Faust will be performed in its entirety, for the first time in England. The preparations for the performance of this grand work have been made at a very considerable expenditure of both energy and money, Mr Hallé bestowing on it the utmost care in his usual zealous manner. The choir has been carefully trained by Mr Otto Peiniger since the winter, and, together with the splendid band under Mr Hallé's direction, a fine rendering may well be anticipated. It would be deplorable, indeed, if such an important musical event passed without recognition from as many lovers of music as the St James's Hall can hold. From a programme enclosed we further derive the information that the accomplished Mdme Albani will sing the soprano part in Beethoven's great Mass in D at the last Symphony Concert on the 22nd inst., that Mdme Norman-Néruda is to play at the intermediate Mendelssohn's Concerto on the 15th, and that Mr Hallé will play Beethoven's Concerto in G, No. 4.—(Communicated.)

MUSIC AT THE ANTIPODES.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The great musical event of the last month has been the English opera season at the Bijou Theatre. The Montague-Turner Opera Company, after a season in Sydney and a tour through New Zealand, made its first appearance in Melbourne in opera seria on the 27th ult. The company includes Misses Annis Montague (prima donna), Williams, and Josephine Deakin, Messrs Charles Turner, first tenor; Edward Farley, J. Gordon, and R. L. Skinner. Mr C. H. Templeton and Miss Lambert have been engaged on certain occasions to sing the parts of Count Arnheim in The Bohemian Girl and Lazarillo in Maritana respectively. The chorus is well-trained and the orchestra, under the conductorship of M. Leon Caron, is efficient. The operas already produced are The Bohemian Girl, Lucia di Lammermoor, and Maritana, the company's repertory also including The Rose of Castile, Faust, Il Trovatore, Lucrezia Borgia, Fra Diavolo, The Maid and the Magpie, and Mignon. All these are sung in English. On the 4th inst. Lucia was heard in English at Melbourne for the first time. Each of the three operas already brought out has had a run of a week. Miss Montague possesses a soprano voice of wide range and great flexibility, and Mr Turner possesses a tenor which he uses in a manly style. The season is to last for six weeks from the 27th ult.

A successful performance of The Creation was given in the Melbourne Town Hall on Good Friday night by the Philharmonic Society. Besides a large chorus and an efficient orchestra, the grand organ was used. The soloists were Mdme Gabriella Boema, soprano; Miss Bessie Pitts, contralto; Mr W. Walshe, tenor; and Mr Juniper, bass. Mr E. King was leader; Mr. G. Peake, organist; and Mr David Lee, conductor. Mdme Boema, who has made herself a favourite in opera and concert, appeared for the first time at Melbourne in oratorio with legitimate success. The whole performance of Haydn's great work was creditable to the Philharmonic Society. The business arrangements were carried out in a satisfactory manner by Mr. R. B. Caunter, secretary.

On the same evening a sacred concert, consisting of selections from Rossini's Stabat Mater, The Creation, Elijah, and The Messiah were given in the Exhibition Building. The leading vocalists were Misses Coy, Josephine O'Brien, and Venosta, Mrs Cutter, Mrs Ramsden, Messrs Paladini, W. R. Furlong, and B. T. Moroney. Mdme Tasca was solo pianist; Mr G. Sykes presided at the organ; Messrs Herz, W. R. Furlong, and A. Plumpton acting as conductors. The united choirs of St. Patrick's Cathedral and St Francis' Church took part in the performance.

The Montague-Turner Opera Company gave Rossini's Stabat Mater at the Bijou Theatre on Good Friday evening.—Bent and Batchelder's Minstrels commenced a season at St George's Hall on the 8th inst.—The organ recitals at the Town Hall by Mr Daniel Lee, city organist, continue to be well patronized.

The illustrious Italian tragedian, Tomaso Salvini, will shortly give a few performances at the Politeama Rossetti, Trieste.

Levy, the cornet-player, has returned from Europe to America, and is engaged for the summer at the Brighton, Coney Island.

Strass, hitherto first solo female dancer at the Theatre Royal, Munich, has deserted Terpsichore and made her début as a singer.

8,630 singers from all parts of Germany have already announced their intention of taking part in the German Singers' Festival, to be held at Hamburgh in August.

The Teatro Carlo Felice, which was nearly being destroyed by fire a short time since, will open for the Carnival season with a grant of 100,000 francs from the Municipality.

Gluck's Betrogener Kadi will very shortly be performed at the Royal Operahouse, Berlin, and with it Holländische Bilder, a ballet given a few years ago at some court festivities.

Anton Rubinstein is in Moscow, where he will conduct the three Orchestral Concerts given by the Society of Music. He returns in June to Peterhof to finish a grand ballet, which will be published in the autumn.

The Duke of Albany in acknowledging the congratulatory resolution from the Board of Management of the Chelsea Hospital for Women, informed the Board that the Duchess of Albany had expressed her gracious intention of interesting herself in the Hospital by becoming a Patroness. This, we believe, is the first indication of interest in English Charitable Institutions which has been given by our new Princess. The new Hospital, the foundation stone of which was laid by the Princess of Wales in July, 1880, will be ready for occupation by the latter part of the present year. (Communicated.)

FORLI.—Masini, the tenor, a native of this little town, being resolved to give the inhabitants an operatic treat such as they never before enjoyed, produced Les Huguenots, with a cast which, besides himself, included Turolla, Toresella, Maini, and Vaselli. Drigo officiated as conductor.

BERGAMO.—The fiftieth anniversary of the first production of Donizetti's Elisir d'Amore was celebrated on the 19th ult. at the Teatro delle Varietà. Sig. Logheder wrote a hymn for the occasion. On the stage was a bust of Donizetti surrounded by flags and crowned with laurels, while before its base were strewn wreaths and flowers.

BERLIN.—Herr Angelo Neumann has leased the Nationaltheater from the 1st October next to the 1st May, 1883, for the purpose of making it exclusively a Wagner Theatre. He will give "Nibelungen Cycles," Tristan und Isolde, Lohengrin, and, if possible, Parsifal.—The Museum has been enriched with a number of curious Japanese musical instruments from the collection of Dr Leopold Müller, for many years private physician to the Mikado.

MILAN.—The Orchestral Society, having brought their series of concerts at the Scala to an end, are making a tour, in the course of which they will visit Bergamo, Brescia, Verona, Vicenza, Padua, and Venice. Faccio, the conductor, accompanies them.—The Swedish harpist, Adolph Sgöden, gave a concert lately in the Royal Conservatory of Music, playing, among other things, a Fantasia on Swedish songs, a Concerto by Oberthür, and compositions by Bach, Mozart, Bovio, and Bazzini.

KREUZNACH.—A musical festival, the fifth since 1875, was held here on the 14th and 15th ult. The first day was devoted to Handel's Judas Maccabæus, and the second to an Artists' Concert, as it is termed, the principal feature in which was Königstochter und Page, for chorus, vocal soloists, and orchestra, by Hugo Willemsen, formerly musical director at Bingen. The chorus numbered 201 members, and the orchestra, which gave Beethoven's "Leonore Overture," No. 3, and Johann Brahms' "Akademische Ouverture," in capital style, was the band of the Establishment (Curcapelle) under Herr A. Parlow. The chief director of the entire festival was Gisb. Enzian.

BAYREUTH.—The cast of Parsifal is now definitively fixed as follows:—Parsifal, Jäger, Vogl, Winkelmann, and Gudehus; Kundry, Mdlle Marianne Brandt, Mdmes Materna, Malten, and Vogl; Gurnemanz, Herren Scaria and Siehr; Amfortas, Herren Reichmann and Fuchs, the latter appearing also as Titurel. The conductors will be Herren Levi and Fischer, from the Theatre Royal, Munich.

VIENNA.—A series of negotiations between the management of the Imperial Operahouse and Mad. Wilt, have resulted in the original eight nights for which she was engaged being extended to fourteen. In order to give a performance of Goldmark's opera, Die Königin von Saba, which has not been played for a considerable time, the management have secured the services of Voggenhuber and her husband, Krolop, the bass, from the Royal Operahouse, Berlin. Voggenhuber replaces Materna, absent on leave, as the Queen, and Marie Wilt will appear as Sulamith. The idea of giving Ambroise Thomas's Françoise de Rimini, and Donizetti's Duca d'Alba, has been for the present abandoned for pecuniary reasons. On the other hand, negotiations are pending with Verdi for the performance of his Don Carlos, or Simon Boccanegra. We cannot felicitate the management. Herr Paul Mader, a former prizeman at the Conservatory, has been provisionally engaged to succeed Herr Paumgartner as "Correpetitor."

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. THE NIBELUNG'S RING.

IV.—The Dusk of the Gods. May 10.

"Everything comes to him who can wait," even the end of a Wagner trilogy, and we have now seen the dusk gather round the gods of Walhall. Dusk! at times on Tuesday evening the wish was for a sun-compelling Joshua to hurry on the night and swallow up the Scandinavian deities, with their hybrid progeny, in blackness of darkness.

Gravely opens the last grand division of the drama, or epic—which is it? We see the Walkyrie rock and "three tall females in sombre and flowing drapery." These are the Norns, the Scandinavian Fates, and, for a time, "gloomy silence reigns," save in the orchestra, which, according to the Wolzogen guide-book, announces "those mighty accords of the greeting of the world." The Norns, unhappily, do not preserve their gloomy silence. One asks, for the strange reason that the night is new, "why should we not spin and sing now?" and, as there seems no just cause or impediment, the First Norn throws the end of a golden chord over a branch of a fir tree. During one moment a wild hope surges up within us. These are the Fates, and mayhap they intend to hang Wotan. Alas! no. The rope is only a mystic plaything, which they throw one to another as, one of another, they ask riddles bearing upon the doom of the gods. Much that they speak of we know; for the rest the "three tall females" leaves us in possession of the fact that Wotan, his spear shivered by Needful, has caused his warriors to split up the "world ash," and pile the timbers around Walhall ready for a grand act of cremation. Thanks, Norns, for the news. Day breaks. Siegfried and Brünnhilde appear, the hero in his wife's armour. Our ex-Walkyrie bears the change with a good grace, and is about to bestow her horse, Grane, upon her awakener, that he might, in knightly fashion, go forth to seek adventures. They part with mutual vows of constancy; Siegfried taking from his finger the accursed ring: "All my valiant deeds of strength, their virtue sprang from this. . . . Now well preserve thou the charm, as wedding gift to my bride." Unhappy Brünnhilde! She no more knows the nature of the gift than does the giver. To the one it is a symbol of luck; to the other of love. Then Siegfried rides away, winding his horn down the mountain, Brünnhilde watching him till the curtain falls. All this is a prologue, and began on Tuesday evening at 6.30.

A new scene—the Hall of the Gibichungs on the Rhine. King Gunther, his sister Gutrune, and Hagen are at table. Mark Hagen. He is the half-brother of Gunther, and his father is Alberich, the Nibelung, for Alberich also—even he who for the gold renounced love—has raised up a son to contend for the ring. This is the man of whom Wotan was warned some time ago; Siegfried must ware him, therefore, if ever they meet. Hagen very soon reveals himself as one worthy to join in the general game of wile and deceit. He speaks to Gunther of the fire-guarded Brünnhilde and of Siegfried the mighty. Brünnhilde should the King wed, and Siegfried, Gutrune. But how to bring this about? When Siegfried comes hither give him a charmed drink, which shall make him forget the Walkyrie, fall in love with Gutrune, and become devoted to Gunther, whose will he will work. A precious plot, but consistent with the course of a story in which drugged draughts jostle open violence for conspicuous wickedness. Now is heard Siegfried's horn, and the hero rows himself across the river to the King's hall. He meets with a seeming courteous welcome from Gunther and Hagen, who soon learns from the unsuspecting guest that the tarnhelm hangs at his belt, while the ring is on Brünnhilde's finger. Gutrune advances from an inner room with the potent draught, and Siegfried drinks to his bride. At once the spell begins to work. Forgetting the Walkyrie, he burns with pasion for his hostess, who retires with inviting bashfulness. Then the hero: "Hast thou a wife, Gunther?" "No, but there is one inaccessible on whom my soul is set." "Can I help thee?" Siegfried is now so far in the trap that, when he hears from the King of Brünnhilde and the fire, he offers to win her in Gunther's shape, assumed by aid of the tarnhelm. The two chiefs then mix their blood in a cup of wine, and drink together, with the oath of blood-brotherhood, from which Hagen holds aloof, having plans of his own. Siegfried starts on the adventure at once, he and Gunther taking boat to Brünnhilde's rock; while Hagen keeps guard at home, rejoicing that the ring will soon be within reach of his hand. This is genuine drama, full of action, purpose, and interest, and not overrun by obscure or mystic talk. We are aroused by it, and eagerly await developments—the more eagerly because clearly the dénouement of the entire elaborate plot is not far off. The scene changes to the Walkyrie's Rock, and shows us Brünnhilde covering the Ring of her absent lord with kisses. Here, however, the action stops, to accommodate one—omitted last night—of those long and tiresome episodes which Wagner, true to his system of almost epic fulness, works out to the bitter end. Waltraute, one of the Walkyrie's sisters, comes from Walhall to tell a sad story of wicked old Wotan. His sins have found him out, and now—we gathered all this from the riddles of the Norns—he and his war-men are sitting in Walhall, helpless, despairing; waiting for the end of their power. Yet there is one hope, since Wotan has been heard to say, "The day the Rhine's three daughters gain by surrender from her (Brünnhilde) the Ring, from the curse's load released are gods and men." Will not Brünnhilde, pleads Waltraute, give the bauble back to its rightful guardians? But gone has all the banished Walkyrie's regard for the things she once prized. She lives for Siegfried alone, and his gift she certainly will not surrender, were it to save a thousand Walhalls. "I'll lose not love from my heart; no 'hest shall hinder my loving; sooner to ruins Walhall's splendour shall crash." With this answer, woeful Waltraute retires; and Siegfried's horn is heard in the valley. Brünnhilde, exulting, goes to meet him; but recoils before a man strange of aspect, whom we know to be no other than her oblivious husband in the form of Gunther. The new-comer claims her for his own by right of force: "The night doth fall, thy room I demand;" but Brünnhilde invokes the protecting power of the Ring. She appeals, alas! to the Ring's lord, and, wresting the fatal gold from her, Siegfried commands her to lead him to her chamber, first, however, drawing his sword: "Now, Needful, witness thou that chaste my wooing is. To seal my oath to my brother, separate me from his bride." With this the act ends, leaving us in the old familiar atmosphere of trickery, deceit, and dishonour. There were twenty minutes on Tuesday night wherein to breathe a purer air, and mayhap to call for water, as Pilate did, wherein to wash one's hands.

When the second act opens we are again at the Hall of the Gibichungs; listening to a conference between Alberich and his worthy son, Hagen. So far the curse of the ring has not fallen upon either Siegfried or Brünnhilde; for they, knowing nothing of its power, use it not. Nevertheless, Hagen is enjoined to wrest it from them by any means: and promises dutiful obedience to his precious sire, the more readily because, were once the gold to return to the Rhine, it would be irrecoverable, and its potency vanish as a dream. Siegfried now appears in his own proper form, but alone. The false Gunther has handed over poor deceived Brünnhilde to the real one, and the pair are coming at leisure. As for Siegfried, he tells Gutrune of the success of the plot, and bids her prepare to receive the bride and bridegroom, who presently come hailed by the vassals with rejoicing. One in the company does not rejoice, and that one is Brünnhilde. Slowly and sadly she advances to the hall, to be met there by Siegfried, her rightful lord, hand in hand with Gutrune. She recoils in amaze, and listens in wonder while the unconscious hero introduces Gunther's sister as his affianced wife. But the Ring is on his finger, and Brünnhilde sees it. Pointing to Gunther, she exclaims—"Thou hold'st it wrongly. It was ravished by this man." The detestable scheme is at once revealed. Siegfried declares that truly he had gained the Ring, but not from Gunther, who, knowing nothing about the bauble, asserts that he had not given it to his friend. Amid the general embroilment, one thing is clear to the injured woman—Siegfried had played her a trick, and all her rage and scorn bursts forth. Henceforth a spirit of revenge possesses her. She accuses Siegfried of having been false to Gunther as well as to herself; and while the hero makes oath that he had respected the bride of his friend; while the wedding festivities of Siegfried and Gutrune go on, she remains outside the hall, listening to the tempter, Hagen, who learns then and there the secret that Siegfried is vulnerable only in the back. Presently these two are joined by Gunther, still doubtful of his honour, and the curtain descends as the three swear the death of him who, by artifice, had fallen into evil ways. If, in the foregoing remarks, we have ceased to tabulate crimes, it is only because we find no names for them in the statute book. What offence is that which takes away a man's memory to make him a traitor to his own honour, and wreck a woman's existence? Or that which swears a lie to compass revenge? Or that which stirs up despair to recklessness of dearest life? There is no criminal nomenclature for such deeds as these, more than that to which the Macbeth witch refers—each is a "deed without a name."

The last act opens in a valley on the Rhine bank, whence we see the daughters of the river disporting themselves, as they await a chance of recovering their lost treasure. Siegfried, out hunting with Gunther and Hagen, wanders that way alone, and from him the nymphs try to obtain the Ring; first by blandishments, and next by warnings of approaching fate. But all is in vain. "For a gaze of love gladly I'd leave it," says the hero, "if you threaten my limbs, though, and life, hardly you'll win from my hands the Ring." On this, with another warning, the Rhine Daughters disappear, while Siegfried, with a smile, reflects, "Alike on land and water, women's ways I've learnt to know." The rest of the hunters appear, and a meal is spread. After discursive talk, Siegfried tells some of his adventures, relating a number of those we have ourselves witnessed in action. As he nears his first encounter with Brünnhilde, wily Hagen—who knows that his memory of her is a blank—secretly brews another wicked drink to restore it, and proffers his cup at the critical moment. The charm works. The betrayed hero's tale runs glibly on, and Gunther soon hears of Siegfried's connection with Brünnhilde. Now the fatal moment has come. Diverting his victim's attention to the flight of a raven, Hagen stabs the hero in the back—(Crime, statutable, the eleventh—murder)—calls the act "retribution," and stalks gloomily homewards. Dying, Siegfried is himself again, and invokes Brünnhilde, his beloved. Dead, the vassals bear him out of sight in solemn procession, to the strains of that magnificent march which will ever rank among Wagner's greatest achievements. Now we are shown the Hall of the Gibichungs once more. It is night, and Gutrune awaits the coming of her husband, announced by Hagen, who, with sinister meaning, exclaims, "Fair booty, bring we along." The booty is Siegfried's corpse, at sight of which the Hall resounds with Gutrune's lamentations and reproaches. Of these Hagen is heedless. On the dead finger rests the Ring, and he claims it. Gunther, intervening, is struck dead by the Nibelung's son (crime the twelfth—murder), who then snatches at the precious treasure. But the clenched hand of the corpse rises threateningly, and all recoil in terror. At that moment Brünnhilde appears. What is the sorrow of Gutrune to hers? Long she looks at the body of her hero, then orders a funeral pyre to be built on the margin of the river. She contemplates the greatest sacrifice—of herself to Siegfried's manes, of the Ring to the Daughters of the Rhine—and bids Wotan's ravens carry the news to Walhall. Taking the Ring from Siegfried's finger, she fires the pyre, invokes her hero, and rushes into the midst of the flames. (Crime the thirteenth—suicide.) As the pyre collapses the Rhine swells up, and its daughters swim forward to grasp the Ring. Hagen, too, rushes at the prize, but is seized by two of the nymphs, who drown him—(crime the fourteenth—murder)—while the third secures the gold and holds it up rejoicingly. Then the entire play ends with a holocaust. Walhall appears in the distance all on fire. The reign of Wotan and his crew has come to an end through the power of love, and Brünnhilde has done "the deed that shall redeem the world."

From the foregoing outline sketch it is clear that the dramatic construction of the Dusk of the Gods approaches nearly to that of ordinary opera. More abundant incident animates the stage; there is far less than usual in the Nibelung's Ring of monologue and duologue, and there are more concerted vocal passages, including some for a male chorus. On account of these things, the drama plays with comparative briskness, and is but slightly affected by the mystic utterances of the Norns and other prosy personages. The chief chatterer, Wotan, happily, does not appear, and, rid of him, the rest can be endured. That the incidents are laid out with skill need hardly be said. In admirable gradation they lead up to the catastrophe, while the duologue is often made attractive by poetic beauty. Had Wagner dealt with this libretto according to the fashion of Lohengrin, the result would have been a splendid opera. As it is, we fear the Dusk of the Gods does not take the first place in the trilogy, but ranks after both the Walkyrie and Siegfried—certainly after the first-named. Yet there are in the work many splendid pages, as, for example, the passionate music of Siegfried and Brünnhilde's parting; the finale to the first act; the rude and realistic scene wherein a chorus is for once employed; the splendid Dead March, which, far better than being a thematic epitome of the hero's life, is a glorious specimen of emotional music; and last, not least, the final sacrifice of Brünnhilde. In these instances and all such, we again declare, the master rises above and overshadows the arbitrary system he has created. "Form is good," said William Penn, "but not formality." Making a like distinction of terms, we assert that Wagner here shows how much better is art than artifice. On the other hand, a great deal of the music belongs to the second of these categories rather than the first. Ingenious it may be, and full of significance to those who have mastered its peculiar language, but ugly and painful it certainly is. Such passages we must decline to accept as music at all, since they have not the character, nor do they discharge the functions of the art. Just here is the fundamental point of difference between acceptors and rejectors of the Wagnerian mode. We, the latter, contend that music is simply the language of emotion; they, the former, make it stand as representative of persons, places, things, and thoughts, from the ugliness or beauty of which it takes form and character. The two points of belief are wide as the poles asunder; but around one gather the traditions of the art, and the practice of great masters; the other, emanating from a single powerful mind, is only a few years old. Regarding Tuesday night's performance, a few words will suffice. Again Frau Vogl won unanimous approval by her impersonation of the hapless Walkyrie. As the tragedy darkened to its close her dramatic power was more and more displayed, till it reached a point not far from greatness. Alike in appearance, bearing, and intensity of expression, Frau Vogl satisfied the requirements of a very arduous part. Fräulein Schreiber, as Gutrune, was adequate, if not striking, a remark equally applicable to the Hagen of Herr Schelper and the Gunther of Herr Wiegand. On the other hand, Herr Vogl played Siegfried with combined intelligence and spirit; acting in a manly and unaffected way, and declaiming the dialogue with no less aptness of expression than power of voice. The subordinate parts were generally well filled, and the orchestra excited less unfavourable observation than heretofore. Three more cycles remaining to be represented, we may find another opportunity for some final remarks upon the Nibelung's Ring as a whole.

STUTTGART.—In consequence of an engagement at the Stadttheater, Frankfort-on-the-Maine, Mdme Hänfstangl requested that she might be released from her engagement at the Theatre Royal; but the King has refused compliance, on the ground that such talent as hers cannot be spared.

BASLE.—Following the example set four years ago by their colleagues in Zurich, the members of the Vocal Union here have given two performances of J. S. Bach's Mass in B minor, in the Cathedral. Thanks to untiring exertions, the somewhat hazardous experiment proved fully successful. Volkland was conductor, and Glaus organist.

PESTH.—Shortly before the close of the season each of the two large theatres announced a novelty—Boito's Mefistofele at the National-Theatre, and Offenbach's Contes d'Hoffmann at the Folk's. Despite the mise-en-scène and spirited rendering, Mefistofele was but coldly received; while, on the contrary, the Contes d'Hoffmann was much applauded.

FORM, OR DESIGN, IN VOCAL MUSIC.

In part II.* there is more variety of key. No. 7 is a recitative going through several keys to a close in B flat, the dominant of the next movement. No. 8, in E flat, is a duet, "Come, my Saviour, and restore me," in the form of the madrigal; for each idea, words and music, is completed before the next is begun. There is much imitation of phrases, with tonic and dominant keys interchanged in the early part, with more modulation towards the middle, and return to tonic key for the close of the movement. No. 9, in G minor, contains the choral, which is first sung by the chorus of tenors, with counterpoints for the treble, alto, and bass solos; and afterwards, to another verse by the chorus of trebles, the counterpoints being given to the alto, tenor, and bass chorus. This movement ends with a long drawn-out close on the major chord of the tonic (Tierce de Picardie).

Ex. 177.

From this point the keys of the cantata must be considered rather in relation to the major form of the original key of C than to the minor, in which it began. The final number is in C major, which must be considered in relation to the whole cantata as a large Tierce de Picardie, or cadence on the major form of the tonic chord; and in relation to that final number, the key (F) of the last but one (No. 10) stands as sub-dominant, and the close in G major of the No. 9, which we have just described, stands as dominant. Following, then, the G major close of the chorus, No. 9, is the movement in F, No. 10, a solo in the Scarlatti form, "Rejoice, O my spirit, in thy consolation." The final number, No. 11, has an introduction somewhat parallel to the scena which precedes an aria; for it is in changing keys and declamatory.

Ex. 178.

It is brought to a full close in the key of G, dominant of C, the key of the principal and concluding portion of the movement. This is a fugue on the words "Praise, and honour, and glory, and power be to our God for evermore. Hallelujah. Amen."

Ex. 179.

Secular works of similar plan, but, of course, without the choral tune, are called in Germany after the words on which they are written. For instance, Mendelssohn's Walpurgis Night and Schumann's Paradise and the Peri are both called ballads, in allusion to the ballad-form of the poetry. Of late years, it has been the habit in England alone to give the name "cantata" to both sacred and secular works of this construction. Sterndale Bennett's May Queen, Henry Smart's Bride of Dunkerron, and his Fisher-maidens,* are cantatas, and many others, both sacred and secular, by living composers. Sterndale Bennett's Woman of Samaria is entitled a sacred cantata, as if to imply that a cantata is properly a secular composition. The sacred works of this kind differ only in length from the oratorio, and sometimes approach so nearly that nothing but the humility of the composer prevents them from being called so.

Opera.

It is said that opera originated with the Greeks, and that their tragedies were sung or intoned throughout, and were, therefore, the first operas. It seems impossible to determine now how much the Greek music consisted of actual melody, or how much it was simply a measured rhythmic intonation through the resonating masks which the actors wore. The mask magnified the sound, and, as well as the rhythmic intonation, was used, like the intoning in a cathedral service of the present day, to enable the voice to travel a great distance, and thus to fill the large open air theatres. Whatever may have been the actual Greek use, the history of opera has been a series of efforts to rise to the ideal of a complete musical or lyrical drama, and whether that ideal is truly Greek or not, it is certainly a true artistic ideal.

In the later years of the Renaissance, when every other art had been revivified on the Greek model, Caccini and Peri, instigated by a cluster of noble amateurs and musicians at Florence, wrote operas on what they believed to be the Greek model of the drama (1597 and onwards).* These were in recitative throughout, free as to time, and designed so as to give the utmost power to the accents of the words, and thus to be truly declamatory. Caccini and Peri were singers, and so were eminently fitted to invent a style of music which was to depend so entirely on the use of the voice, both verbally and vocally.

Monteverde followed a few years later (1607), and he, being not a singer, but a theoretical musician as well as a practical composer, added his power to the invention of his predecessors by using a large orchestra instead of the three or four instruments and the figured bass of their works; and this, with the varied combinations he used in his thickly harmonized accompaniments, gave particular effects to each character and each scene.

Cavalli (1640) and Cesti (1649) followed, and brought rhythmic melody into opera, where it had been refused admittance before as childish and not worthy of the great Greek school of art.

After them came Alessandro Scarlatti, a man of great learning as well as genius, the whole force of which he put into his operas (1680). He is supposed to have been the first to use interludes or phrases for the orchestra between the vocal phrases; and it is thought to be about his time that the difference began to be made between speaking recitative with its lute or harpsichord accompaniment, and accompanied recitative with full orchestral accompaniment and interludes. He also used in his operas that earliest vocal form which has been described in previous pages as the Scarlatti form. Though this particular form is somewhat undramatic in the exactness of its repetition of the first part, yet much is owing to Scarlatti for this first introduction of an air of complete design. An air, in any of the later designs that have grown from this, is as fitting in its proper place in the musical drama as a soliloquy is in the spoken drama. We cannot even in real life be always running about the world; we must sometimes stay awhile and think. So, doubtless, thought Scarlatti when he held his hero for a moment to meditate; so, doubtless, thought Shakspere when he made Hamlet stand and think, "To be, or not to be," and made Desdemona sit and sing about the willow.

Unfortunately, art, like all growing things, must either improve or go back, and after Scarlatti came many composers who cultivated the set airs and forgot the drama which was the origin of the airs; and opera became a chain of airs in a prescribed order, sung by a prescribed number of singers of prescribed kinds of voice.

Gluck set himself to reform these and other abuses in the opera of his day, and began this reformation with his opera Alceste, in 1767. He wished to go back to the original ideal of Caccini and Peri, namely, Greek drama, wherein the drama was to be the first thing to be thought of, and music was to heighten and strengthen its effect. But Gluck, unlike Caccini and Peri, did not deem that all that was best and most beautiful in music must be cast aside and nothing kept but that which was dreariest and most monotonous, so that, maybe, poetry and action might shine by the poverty of music; nor did he, like Monteverde, think of the orchestra as the principal means of distinguishing characters and scenes from one another. On the contrary, Gluck added the experience of his predecessors to his own genius and dramatic feeling, and, therefore, in his effort to strengthen the expression of the poetry and the action of the drama by music, he used all the means that music gave him.

Good judges say that he had not a perfect knowledge of music, so that in some points he may have failed to use everything that was possible; but all that he had he used and despised nothing. Music must be the help-mate and not the abject slave of poetry and the drama, and to be a fit help-mate she must have all her faculties and powers. If the dramatic poet is to ride upon Pegasus, with advantage, he must not cut off his wings or his legs. Bridle him if you will but lame him not.

Many composers since Gluck's day, as well as those before him, have not written up to the standard which he set up, but we cannot do otherwise than consider those the noblest who have best striven to do so.

MICHAEL WILLIAM BALFE.

(From the "Morning Post.")

The Dean of Westminster, Dr Bradley, in giving permission to erect a tablet to the memory of Michael William Balfe in the noble and time-honoured Abbey over which he presides, has done an act of grace and of justice. There are few names better known in the musical world than that of the composer of the Bohemian Girl, whether it be in or out of England. The number and variety of his works, and the lasting popularity of many of his melodies, is a strong testimony to the influence his genius exercised over his countrymen; and the respect paid to his talent in the great continental musical centres is a further proof that his accomplishments were recognized in those countries where the possibility of the existence of an English composer was a matter hard to believe. His music did not minister to a merely ephemeral taste, neither did it derive its success from his personal influence. Had such been the case he would in all probability have outlived his works, and have regretted the fickleness of popular fancy. But only last week an English opera company performed three of his works in Birmingham, and each night there were more people presenting themselves for admission than the house could hold, and many had to retire in disappointment. Some of his music is constantly given in France, and in Germany the Vier Haimon's Kinder especially, and one or two others of his operas are among the most attractive of the stock pieces of the several theatres. In London, where, like the Athenians of old, audiences are ever on the look out for some new thing, his ballads are always welcome and productive of delight. His melodies, fraught with a special character, have given rise to new thought in music, and his name has been used as the basis of a new adjective to qualify the description of music written in a manner he was the first to employ. The sweetness of his melodies, their influence over the feelings by their truly emotional character, justify his claim to be considered as a national composer, one who has done good in his generation and added much by his gifts to the number of pure pleasures all with ears to hear and hearts to feel can enjoy. The honour to be paid to his memory in Westminster Abbey is therefore an act of grace.

In the reign of Queen Elizabeth English musical genius was encouraged and recognized both at home and abroad. The progress of development in all arts and sciences was checked by the events which occurred in the subsequent reigns. When "the peaceful arts once more did smile" the attempt to elevate native musical skill to the position it once occupied was successfully made by Pelham Humfrey, whom King Charles sent to France to study under the great Lully, and by the pupil of Humfrey, greater than his master, the immortal Henry Purcell. Both of these great men lie in the peaceful cloisters of the Abbey. More than half a century after the death of Purcell, during which time English art was crushed out of life by the unpatriotic patronage of foreign musicians, Dr Arne exerted his genius in the furtherance of the design suggested by Purcell, and produced music which was not only successful in its day, but which still lives fresh and green, a triumphant proof of the lasting character of native musical power. In his Artaxerxes he sought to prove the possibility of English opera after the accepted model of fashionable Italian opera, and succeeded so far as to enable his model work to continue its popularity until a greater genius than himself arose. Originally produced in 1762, Dr Arne's Artaxerxes kept the stage until the year 1838, the same year which saw the production of Balfe's first English opera, The Siege of Rochelle. There are many yet living who can still recall the extraordinary effect this work created at the time, and there are thousands who have never seen the opera whose hearts have been gladdened by the sweetness and touching simplicity of many of its melodious extracts. Balfe, hitherto known only as an accomplished and well-trained vocalist, was now acknowledged to be the possessor of the rarest gifts that ever excited the admiration of his compatriots. From that time onward his career was one altogether unprecedented in this country. An inexhaustible store of tunefulness seemed to be at his command, and

> "With smiling grace he roused the Muse > Whose beauteous charms enslaved the soul."

Opera after opera he gave to the world, scoring a success for each successful score, each increasing in popularity and power, though produced with astonishing rapidity, the bombastic absurdity of many of his librettos never interfering with the hearty reception accorded to his music. So great was the fascination of his genius that it imparted a poetical strength to words which, taken by themselves, seemed to be inconsequential nonsense. Sir Henry Bishop, whose beautiful songs, glees, and choruses contributed towards the success of a number of dramas, had the advantage of the collaboration of some of the best contemporary poets, and many of his ballads which still hold sway over the popular mind are marked by true poetical expression in the words, so that "voice and verse, twin-born harmonious sisters," unite to strengthen their hold upon the mind. Balfe's music supplies the sentiment and motion often lacking or only dimly indicated in the words with which they are associated. It calls into strong life those feelings which the poet strove but failed to give birth to, and therefore it may be truly said that Balfe was a poet in music whose expressions never fail to touch the chord of sympathy.

That this power was not confined in its recognition to his own countrymen, there are many pieces of evidence to prove. Balfe was invited to write operas to Italian and to French librettos, and there are some which have become popular through the medium of the German tongue. The greatest dramatic poets and musicians contemporary with him have claimed artistic fellowship with his genius. The universality of his talents has been admitted on all sides. Rossini held him to be as Italian as the Italians; Scribe and Auber welcomed him as having all the esprit expected in the best French musicians; it has been also happily said that the music of Balfe is in the blood of the Germans, and Englishmen are proud to claim him as thoroughly national. The honour now to be paid to his memory in the venerable Abbey of Westminster, the place where so much of native genius is peacefully commemorated, is therefore not only an act of grace, but an act of justice. The concession granted by the sympathetic ruler of that ancient pile is one which should awaken a feeling of gratitude in the heart of every musician, for it is not only that the memory of Balfe is kept green by the refreshing dew of distinguished recognition in a more tangible form than that which his never-dying melodies supplies, but the whole principle and value of national musical art is thereby acknowledged, and a distinct honour is reflected upon all English musicians.

MUSICAL COPYRIGHT.—You are an amateur with a nice voice, and you are asked to sing at a charity concert. You cheerfully accept, and deliver some favourite old ditty such as "She wore a Wreath of Roses," with great effect. You afterwards discover that in the audience you had at least one highly appreciative listener, for within a day or two you receive a letter from an enterprising gentleman, who says that he is agent for the holder of the copyright of the above song, and who threatens proceedings in case a certain fine is not paid forthwith. As you are informed that legally this gentleman is within his rights, and that you have not a leg to stand upon, you pay the money, but your enthusiasm for singing at charitable concerts is thereafter visibly cooled. Now it is a monstrous thing that a carelessly-worded enactment should enable these crafty spiders to make prey of poor musical flies who buzz unaware into their nets. So Mr Gorst has brought in a Bill which enacts that if the owner of a musical copyright desires to retain in his hands the right of public representation he must print a notice to that effect outside the cover of the piece. We hope Mr Chamberlain will support this sensible little Bill, which deals with a downright injustice, and will not insist on Mr Gorst waiting (as he hinted on Monday night) till the copyright question can be dealt with as a whole. The copyright question as a whole is a very complicated affair, and is chiefly interesting to publishers and authors,* who are quite capable of looking after their own interests, and who do manage, even under the present confessedly defective system, to secure pretty completely what they want; whereas this manifest abuse of musical copyright affects the public generally, and inflicts anxiety and pecuniary loss on a set of inexperienced persons, who deserve encouragement rather than punishment.—Graphic.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

That melody, pure and simple, still retains its charm for the public was evident on Tuesday night by the spontaneous applause bestowed upon the performance of Bellini's La Sonnambula. Madame Sembrich, by admirable vocal art, then showed that the vein of melody opened up by the Sicilian composer fifty years ago still yields materials worthy of the singer's highest skill. In the cantabile passages her phrasing, marked, as it was, by inflections of tone and grace of accent, seemed a direct inheritance from the singers, who, from the time of Pasta to the present, have made the part of Amina illustrious in operatic history. The florid and sometimes erratic embellishments of the melodious text were invariably executed with surprising force and agility. Throughout Madame Sembrich's impersonation of Amina many excellent qualities were revealed; but the chief characteristic was undoubtedly vocal skill that never once faltered. The audience, after the daring flights in "Ah! non giunge," recalled the singer to testify by loud applause their gratification. M. Mussart (Elvino) made his début on the Covent Garden stage on this occasion. This gentleman at once secured the sympathy and goodwill of the audience by youthfulness appropriate to the part. Indeed, it is not often that the stage-lover is seen to depend so little upon his "make-up" as did M. Mussart. But if he has the attraction of youth, it is not unaccompanied with the defects inseparable from inexperience. Freshness of voice, does not fully atone for comparatively unfinished vocalization, nor a juvenile appearance for the aids that come from stage training. Further opportunities of study and practice will, doubtless, make M. Mussart a very acceptable lyric artist; but Covent Garden is hardly the place in which to serve a novitiate. Signor de Reszke (Rodolfo) was successful as far as regards the bearing of the character, but overdrawn sentiment occasionally marred his otherwise excellent singing. Signor Bevignani kept his orchestral forces in mind of the fact that the interest for that night was centred on the stage.

Lohengrin, performed for the first time this season on Thursday evening, was put upon the stage with the magnificence that has made Covent Garden famous, every opportunity offered for display being utilized to the utmost. The orchestra, holding such an important place in Wagner's works, carried out as usual the designs of the author by giving clear and ample expression to the ideas, sentiments, and passions of the stage. For instance, the instrumental illustrations of the lugubrious scene in the second act, where Federico and Ortruda moan and plot together, were effectively rendered. But throughout the evening the band was admirable. By far the most commendable feature in the performance was Mdme Albani's impersonation of Elsa, and the trait in the character especially accentuated was its womanliness. Mdme Albani never lifts Elsa into the regions of the heroic, but always keeps her subdued and essentially feminine. When before her foes, in the opening scene, she patiently bore unjust accusations, and showed no hate or revenge as the sword of Lohengrin avenged her; when, at the promptings of pity she admitted the cunning sorceress into her house to reinstate her into love and favour; when, yielding to the tempter, she gave way to a curiosity that rebelled even against her marriage vow; and when the full extent of the misery thus wrought by imprudence was laid before her—in all and each of these situations Mdme Albani kept the true woman well in view. That her fine voice afforded full and ready aid in working out so well-conceived a part will be taken for granted. M. Sylva gave a manly rendering of Lohengrin, singing the music with vigour, and acting with the judgment that comes of ripe experience. This gentleman may not present an ideal knight, but he is, all the same, an accomplished artist. M. Gresse (King) was tremulous in voice, which, if designedly so, to stimulate extreme age, was, perhaps, not out of place. But why did M. Dauphin (Herold) attempt to vie with him? If vibrato be a fashion the sooner it is discarded the better. Mdlle Stahl, as Ortruda, avoiding the repulsive side of this unattractive character, gave the delineation expected from so thoughtful and efficient an artist. Signor Cotogni was the Telramund we all know so well.

Il Seraglio was generally well given on Monday night, above all as regards the two female characters, Costanza (Mdme Sembrich) and Biondina (Mdme Valleria). The Hungarian soprano appeared in her very best form. Like most genuine artists, she does not move along a dead level, but encounters the ups and downs incidental to susceptible temperaments. Throughout Il Seraglio she was, so to speak, on a hill; singing with rare facility, enthusiasm, and expression. The rendering by Mdme Sembrich of the famous and, generally considered, impossible air, "Martern aller Arten," could not have been surpassed by any living singer. It was a magnificent vocal effort, and called forth the greatest enthusiasm —not the enthusiasm of bouquets and flower-baskets, at which sensible people laugh, but that of genuine and spontaneous applause. The Biondina of Mdme Valleria commanded equal approval for its own special qualities. Not only did the artist, always trustworthy, sing her music with as much apt expression as real skill, but she acted in the true spirit of comedy, entering into each situation, and considering no touch superfluous however likely to be overlooked. This was apparent above all in the amusing scene with Osmin, but, as a matter of fact, at no moment when Mdme Valleria trod the stage did the audience miss a sprightly, and, at the same time, artistic Biondina. The Belmonte of Signor Frapolli could scarcely be accused of excessive sprightliness. Nevertheless, the Italian tenor* sang with taste and commanded approval, as did, for various reasons, M. Gailhard, a humorous Osmin; M. Soulacroix, a lively Pedrillo; and Signor Scolara, a portly and pompous Selim. The choral and orchestral music gave no cause for other than satisfaction with the conductor, M. Dupont.

On Tuesday L'Africaine was revived, with the part of Selika entrusted to Mdme Pauline Lucca, as it used to be in the days when Meyerbeer's "Swan's Song" was fresher to the public ear than now. Selika is one of the characters that fall naturally to the German prima donna, and in the embodiment of which it seems impossible for her to be other than truthful and picturesque. Mdme Lucca's success, therefore, was assured beforehand, the more positively because no impersonation of all that she has given on our stage is better remembered. In the ten years that have elapsed since she last played Selika amongst us, her conception of the part has not changed. She still presents the African princess as a woman whose magnanimity of soul is greater than even the force of her passion, and who, though impulsive and imperious, knows how to make sacrifice and to die. Whether by art or by instinct matters not, this is the Selika which Mdme Lucca portrays in bold and decided outline, and than this Selika no other could so readily evoke approval and applause. Inez had a charming representative in Mdme Valleria, who, by the power of her sympathetic acting and singing, invested the character with more interest than naturally belongs to it, while the very pronounced dramatic method of Signor Pandolfini secured excellent results in that of Nelusko. Exaggeration here was barely possible, and the artist's besetting weakness became for once a source of strength. As Don Pedro M. Gresse showed himself careful and efficient, while M. Sylva was musically successful as Vasco di Gama. He sang throughout intelligently and well, bearing himself, moreover, as gallantly as possible under the weight of a character quite as contemptible as the Pollione of Norma. Several "cuts," more or less open to question, were made in the usual acting version of the opera. It was curious to note that the famous orchestral unison-prelude to the last act, once always doubly encored, passed without a "hand." Signor Bevignani was, as usual, an excellent conductor.

THE NATIONAL ANTHEM FOR INDIA.

SIR,—May the public learn that the suggestion recently made by the writer of a leading article in the Daily Telegraph will be acted upon? Whilst favourably advocating the project of translating the National Anthem into fourteen Eastern languages, and scattering it broadcast through the length and breadth of India, The Telegraph expresses the opinion that, if it is to win its way among the native population, the music as well as the words should be Oriental. A letter will immediately be forwarded to Dr Sourindro Mohun Tagore, of Calcutta, the principal authority upon Hindu music, requesting him to secure the services of the best native composer and a melody which shall at once suit Oriental taste and the measure of the translated hymn.

May I further say that the first of these translations (the Hindustani) has been heard and approved by about 200 of the best judges. It is now ready to be sent out, only waiting until those who can afford to befriend India will permit this seed of loyal unanimity to be sown upon its plains.—With compliments, Sir, I remain your obedient servant,

FREDERICK K. HARFORD.

COLOGNE.—During the past season at the Stadttheater, there were 139 performances of 38 different operas, the novelties being Der Widerspenstigen Zähmung, Goetz; Genoveva, Schumann; Der Dämon, Rubinstein: Die Grille, Semet; Die Götterdämmerung, Wagner; Idomeneus and Così fan Tutte, Mozart.

TURIN.—The International Musical Festival, which was to take place this summer, has been postponed till the summer of 1884, when it will be given in connection with the National Exhibition.

THE funeral of Mrs Sullivan took place at Brompton Cemetery on Thursday, the 1st June. The coffin and the open car upon which it was carried were covered with wreaths and crosses of beautiful white flowers, sent by numerous attached friends of the deceased lady. Mr Arthur Sullivan, her sole surviving son, was chief mourner, and with him were the widow and children of his late brother, Mr Frederic Sullivan, Mr John Sullivan, his uncle, and the following invited relations and friends: Captain Hutchinson (who married Mrs Frederic Sullivan), Mr B. Findon, Mr Tom Chappell, Mr Frederic Clay, Mr Ballard Carter, Mr Edward Dicey, Mr A. Dremel, Mr George Grove, Mr E. A. Hall, and Mr Smythe. Besides these, there were assembled at the grave Messrs D'Oyly Carte, Arthur Cecil, Frank Cellier, Louis Engel, Michael Gunn, Douglas Grant, George Grossmith, Stanley Lucas, Rev. J. R. Richardson, Mdme Montigny, and many other relations and personal friends of the deceased, including many ladies. The service was read by the Rev. Thomas Helmore, Priest-in-Ordinary to the Queen and Master of the Children of H.M. Chapels Royal, who, from the time Mr Arthur Sullivan entered the choir of the Chapel Royal under his tuition, twenty-eight years ago, has been the attached and faithful friend of Mr Sullivan and his family. H.R.H. the Duke of Edinburgh sent his private secretary, Mr G. F. Bambridge, to represent him, as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, for whom His Royal Highness had a great regard.

MR HENRY HERSKE has not resigned the position of Secretary to the Philharmonic Society, a fact which all well-wishers to that time-honoured institution will be glad to learn.

MR HENRY IRVING has entered into an engagement with Mr Henry F. Abbey, the American Colossus, to make a professional tour of the United States and Canada, commencing in New York, October 29, 1883. Mr Irving will be accompanied by Miss Ellen Terry and the Lyceum company.

AMONG those present at Rossini's funeral, in Paris, was Auber. On returning, after the ceremony, the witty composer, who was eighty-four, observed to his colleague, Gounod: "I fancy this is the last time I shall attend a funeral en amateur."

ABOUT Mdme Sarah Bernhardt, who is renewing her triumphs at Mr Hollingshead's theatre, we shall speak in our next. Her engagement is a short one; but every play in which she appears is worth hearing, and should be heard by admirers of her transcendent acting.

MARRIAGE.

(From the "Daily Telegraph.")

It may be an offence against the ethics of operatic management to select works for the prima donna instead of the prima donna for the works, but this course is not an unmitigated evil. To it was certainly owing the production of Mozart's Il Seraglio last season, and the same cause operated for its revival on Monday night. Few directors, even those of classical inclinations, are fortunate enough to command the services of an artist equal to the music of Costanza, while it may be that fewer still would find such an exceptionally gifted singer willing to prefer Mozart to the more catching and frivolous Italian composers. Mr Gye and Mdme Sembrich are exceptions to the rule. The manager has the artist, and the artist has the preference; the public, on their part, being gainers by the opportunity of witnessing an opera which, musically considered, is one long delight. Our attention has of late been demanded by a form of lyric drama to which Il Seraglio presents the greatest possible contrast. We have seen music in humble attendance upon the play, the one being dominated by the other, bored by the other, compelled to forms of ugliness by the other, till not only its rightful supremacy but its native charm has been almost lost. In Mozart's work this position is entirely reversed. There music reigns, and the drama is but an opportunity for its expression. Poor, halting drama we grant it to be, without much interest either of character or situation. But this matters little. The loves of Costanza and Belmonte, the fortunes of Biondina and Pedrillo, and the humours of Selim, give pretext for a series of delightful musical pieces which appeal to us with the eloquence of natural truth and consummate art, which are not encumbered by arbitrary meanings, and do not require sign-posts or guide-books. Admitting that Il Seraglio scarcely illustrates the ideal union of music and drama, it is, at least, faulty on the right side. It never bores us with far-fetched theories which spoil both arts, but gives us at least music in its purity. The performance of Mozart's work seemed to be enjoyed by its audience, and, truly, no other result was conceivable, even in view of a representation far inferior. Who would not enjoy such a stream of delightful melody, set off by the resources of a genius which may indeed be called heaven-descended? We have lived to hear Mozart styled "infantine;" and so he is, but not in the sense meant. He is infantine in purity and freshness, in native grace and artlessness, and in the irresistible unconscious attraction which compels our love. Let us be thankful for such artistic "infants," and hope they may never grow into adults prolific of bombast and eaten up with conceit.

BAYREUTH v. PARIS.

The subjoined letter, addressed to M. Edouard, Dujardin, appeared in the Renaissance Musicale:

"Bayreuth, 17th May, 1882.

"DEAR SIR,—An extract from a newspaper which has been sent me and which I transmit you proves that the question of performing Lohengrin in Paris, is enveloped in obscurity; I will endeavour to put it in a clear light. Not only do I not wish Lohengrin to be played in Paris, but I strongly desire it may not be played there, and for the following reasons: In the first place, Lohengrin, having made its way all over the world, does not require it; then it is impossible to translate it into and sing it in French so as to give any idea of what it is. As to a performance in German, I can easily conceive that the Parisians have no wish for one. With regard to the execution of fragments, I had no objection as long as they were really fragments; but now that entire acts are given at concerts, I will not deny that the practice is disagreeable to me. I gave Herr Neumann permission to play my works in Paris without, I frankly confess, thinking much what I was doing. On reflection I have begged him to abandon Paris, and, as the object of his enterprise cannot be to annoy me, I feel pretty sure I shall gain him over to my way of thinking, which I hesitate imposing absolutely upon him, because he has gone so far into the business as to incur expense. My works are essentially German and I feel confident that those among your countrymen to whom they appear, for one reason or the other, worthy of attention, will not refuse to hear them in the original.

Be kind enough, dear sir, to publish these lines, in order that those who like to know the exact truth may be correctly informed as to my opinion concerning the representation of my works in Paris.—I remain, dear sir, yours truly,

RICHARD WAGNER."

The foregoing notice, unchanged in any essential particulars, appeared, as I have already stated, rather more than eighteen years ago, in the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik.

Even at the present day I can scarcely comprehend how my recently deceased friend, Franz Brendel, the editor of that paper, could make up his mind to venture on publishing such an article; a man of serious purpose, who boldly looked things in the face, and was thoroughly upright and honest, he merely supposed, however, when he inserted it, that he was assigning the space imperatively demanded for the investigation of an exceedingly interesting question concerning the history of music. But the result taught him with whom he had to do. Leipsic, where he held an appointment as professor at the Conservatory of Music, had, in consequence of the labours, during a long series of years, of Mendelssohn, justly honoured as he deserved, been baptized musically according to the Jewish rite; as a critic said, complainingly, at the time, blond musicians had become more and more rare, and a place once so distinguished by its university and its great book trade, in all German matters, forgot, as far as music was concerned, everything like the feeling of local patriotism, which is, as a rule, so spontaneously characteristic of the cities of Germany; it became exclusively the Jewish musical capital. The storm which broke out against Brendel rose to such a pitch as to threaten his social existence; it was with difficulty, and solely owing to his firmness and to the calm exposition of his conviction, that his opponents were compelled to leave him in possession of his post at the Conservatory.

What soon enabled him to escape from material molestation was a characteristic turn which the affair took after the first unthinking outburst of rage on the part of those aggrieved.

I had never entertained any idea of denying, if the avowal should be requisite, that I was the author of the notice; I simply wished to prevent the question, which I had treated in a very serious and objective spirit, from being dragged at once into the domain of pure personality, and this, in my opinion, was to be expected, if my name, that is to say, the name of "a composer undoubtedly jealous of the reputation of others," were brought forward from the beginning. I appended, therefore, to the article a pseudonym: K. Freigedank, which was intentionally recognizable as such. I had communicated my object on this head to Brendel, who had the courage stedfastly to allow the storm to break over him, instead of diverting it to me, and immediately relieving himself. I soon perceived signs, nay, evident allusions, showing that I had been recognized as the author; I never answered an accusation of this kind by a denial. My opponents learned sufficient from this to change completely the system of tactics they had previously adopted. Hitherto only the heavier artillery of Judaism had been brought into the fight, to bear against the article; there was no attempt made to put forth an answer in anything like an intellectual or even skilful manner. Coarse attacks, and an insulting system of defence against a tendency imputed to the author of the article to hate the Jews, a tendency peculiar to the Middle Ages, and disgraceful for an enlightened age like ours, together with absurd misrepresentation and falsification of what had been said—such was all that appeared. But there was now a change. At any rate, higher Judaism took the matter up. What annoyed this class of persons was the commotion that had been excited; immediately my name was known, the fact of its being brought into the discussion could only raise apprehensions that public attention would be excited still more. But a ready means of avoiding this was found in the circumstance of my having substituted a pseudonym for my real name. It now appeared advisable to continue ignoring me as the author of the article, and even to stop all talk about it. But I was to be got at in quite a different way; I had published works on art, and written operas, and I then wished to see the latter produced. A system of calumny and persecution of me as an author and a composer, the disagreeable question of Judaism being at the same time completely dropped, promised to furnish the means of wreaking upon me the punishment desired.

It would be, perhaps, arrogant on my part, as I then lived in close retirement at Zurich, were I to attempt to describe minutely the inward working of the persecution commenced against me in their turn by the Jews, and continued on a constantly increasing scale. I will merely narrate facts which anyone may verify. After the production of Lohengrin, at Weimar, in the summer of 1850, men of eminent artistic and literary reputation, such as Adolf Stahr and Robert Franz, came forward encouragingly in the press, to direct the attention of the German public to me and to my work; even in musical papers of suspicious tendency there appeared most important revelations for me. But this happened only once in the case of each of the several writers. They all became dumb immediately afterwards, or, in course of time, even hostile according to circumstances. On the other hand, a professor Bischoff, the friend and admirer of Herr Ferdinand Hiller, now cropped up in the Kölnische Zeitung, where he founded the system of calumny afterwards pursued against me. This individual confined himself to my works on art, and twisted my idea of "An Art-work of the Future" into the laughable tendency of a "Music of the Future," that is to say, music that would turn out very well at a future period, though it might be bad at present. Not a word was said by him about Judaism; on the contrary, he plumed himself upon being a Christian, and descended from a Superintendant. On the other hand, he said I had declared that Mozart and even Beethoven were bunglers; and that I wished to do away with melody and, henceforward, have only psalmody.

Even now-a-days, my dear Madame, directly the conversation turns upon the "Music of the Future," you will hear nothing but these things said. Just reflect with what vigorous persistency such absurd calumny must have been sustained and spread about, since, simultaneously with the actual and popular propagation of my operas, the said calumny, directly my name is mentioned, appears again, with continually renewed force as being something that is no more disputed than it is to be disproved.

Since people could ascribe to me such senseless theories, the musical works which sprang from those theories must naturally be of the most repugnant kind; no matter what their success, the press still persevered in asserting that my music must be as atrocious as my theory. This was the point on which to lay particular stress! The really educated and intelligent classes must be won over to this view of the case. This object was effected through the instrumentality of a Viennese lawyer, a great musical amateur, proficient in Hegel's dialectics, and, moreover, easily accessible on account of his Jewish descent, though he delicately disguised the latter. He, too, was one of those who had, at first, declared for me with almost enthusiastic partiality; his conversion was effected so suddenly and violently that I was perfectly aghast at it. This individual, now, wrote a libel on the Musically Beautiful, in which he pursued a course unusually well adapted to advance generally the interests of musical Judaism. In the first place, by means of an exceedingly dainty dialectical form, which looked quite like the finest philosophical profundity, he deceived all the intelligence of Vienna into the belief that a prophet had really risen up among them; and this was the great aim he had in view. For what he coated with this elegant colouring consisted of the most trivial commonplaces, such as can be propagated, with any appearance of significance, only in a sphere where, as in that of music, people have always begun talking rubbish immediately they commenced æstheticizing about this art. It was certainly no such clever thing to claim for Music the "Beautiful" as principal postulate; if, however, the author could effect his purpose in this respect, so as to cause everyone to feel astounded at such genial wisdom, he would be able to succeed in something decidedly more difficult, namely, the task of setting up modern Jewish music as the really "beautiful" music; and, without a soul's perceiving what he was about, he caused this dogma to be silently recognized by appending Mendelssohn, quite naturally, as it were, to the series consisting of Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven; nay, if we understand correctly his theory of the "Beautiful," he really attributed to Mendelssohn the merit of having done an important and beneficial thing; of having happily re-arranged the web of beauty, which had been thrown somewhat into confusion by his immediate predecessor, Beethoven. If, now, Mendelssohn were once raised to the throne, a feat that was to be gracefully accomplished by placing at his side certain Christian notabilities, such as Robert Schumann, among others, a great deal more might be rendered credible in the domain of modern music. But the principal object of the entire æsthetic enterprise was already achieved; the author had, by his clever libel, gained universal respect, and thus obtained a position which lent him importance, when he, an admired æsthetician, appeared as critic in a widely-read political paper, and declared me and my artistic efforts utterly null and void. The fact of his not being led astray by the great success with which my works met on the part of the public, necessarily invested him with all the greater nimbus; and, in addition, he succeeded (or others succeeded through him) in causing, at least, wherever newspapers are read in the world, this tone to become the style when speaking of me, a tone which you, my dear Madame, were so astonished at meeting everywhere. But reference was made to nothing except my contempt for all the great masters of tone; to my hostility towards melody; to my horrible compositions, in a word, to the "Music of the Future"; but still not the slightest notice was taken of the article on "Judaism in Music." This, on the contrary, as is the case in all such rare and sudden instances of conversion, worked all the more efficaciously in secret; it was the head of Medusa, immediately held before anyone in whom there appeared an inconsiderate partiality for me.

DIE MEISTERSINGER.

SIR,—What would the Messrs Corder have done, in their translation of Wagner's Meistersinger, without the Anglo-Saxon word "wax"—to rhyme with Sachs? We are surely being Wagnerized to extremity. Beethoven never wrote nine lines in self-glorification; Wagner has written nine volumes—his nine symphonies. Oh, that he had composed a "No. 1," with a full close here and there! The last close best of all. I am puzzled to understand how the London musical public can possibly reckon in its numbers so large a minority of ———

Your correspondent, "Fiat Justitia," is a noodle, as I could easily show were it worth the showing.

AN ENGLISH MUSICIAN.

Clarendon Hotel, Birmingham.

KING LUIS OF PORTUGAL once promised Rossini a cask of some wine made expressly for the Royal cellar. But the memory of kings is not better than that of ordinary mortals, and—the wine did not appear. The great composer, however, was not the man to forget a promise, and addressed the following to his Majesty of Portugal:

"Your Majesty promised to send me a cask of wine, but it has never arrived. Of course, you have not forgotten your promise, sire, for kings never forget; but allow me to remind you that at my time of life no time is to be lost."

The wine was sent with Royal expedition.

AIX-LA-CHAPELLE.—The fifty-ninth Musical Festival of the Lower Rhine went off extremely well, and was attended by larger numbers than had been present at any previous Festival. The proceedings on the first day opened with Mozart's symphony, in G minor. Then came Handel's Joshua, which went admirably under Herr F. Wüllner's direction, and was energetically applauded. The solo-singers were—Mdlles Lilli Lehmann and Fides Keller, Herren Riese and Carl Meyer. The second day's programme included Mendelssohn's Erste Walpurgisnacht, fragments from Gluck's Armide, and Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony," with the Prelude and "Liebestod," from Wagner's Tristan und Isolde. Hans von Bülow, as solo-pianist, performed variations on the Eroica, and Johann Brahms's First Concerto.

CONCERTS.

RICHTER CONCERTS.—At the fifth concert, given in St James's Hall, on Friday evening, a new violinist appeared, to make up, in the estimation of novelty-lovers, for the otherwise entire absence of that which they crave. Almost of course, the débutant was a German. This is the year of the Germans, who bid fair to render it as famous in our musical history as the Normans made 1066 in the annals of the nation. The Normans came and stopped; and the Germans are exceedingly likely to do the same, with a view to parcelling out a fat artistic domain, and ousting its old possessors. No other invaders have a chance. The Italians are out of it, or, at most, hold a mere corner of Covent Garden, having given up the rest to Frenchmen and Belgians, who themselves, surrounded by grim and hungry Teutonic bands, spend a precarious existence. As for the aborigines—well, they continue to accept, with traditional meekness, the rôle of those who find the money, taking pride, perhaps, in the ownership of a purse which attracts all the musical free lances of Europe. A good many quacks and shams come to our shores, but Herr Georg Hänflein, the violinist of Friday night, is not one of them, if judgment may be given simply upon the hearing of Spohr's Dramatic Concerto as played by him. A strong fiddler Herr Hänflein cannot be called, but he is very tender and graceful, executing cantabile passages with the taste and expression of a great vocal artist. Hence he was heard to most advantage in the Cavatina—that movement wherein Spohr has combined Italian sweetness with German feeling, and thus produced a better thing than either standing alone. Herr Hänflein's tone is not large; on the other hand, he phrases well, his intonation is certain, and his command over the instrument, if not regally powerful, cannot be charged with incompleteness. Referring to Spohr's work, it is curious to observe, as significant of an almost puerile revolt against classic forms, that the annotator of the programme pointed to the dominant and tonic chords at the end of the recitative as a device which "in more modern compositions has happily now almost become obsolete." Why happily? Is there really treason to art in a "full close" where the ear expects it, where the sense requires it, and where those benighted creatures, Mozart and Beethoven, rarely failed to employ it? Whatever the answer to this question, we do not deny that very many inditers of "modern compositions" seem to exhaust the greater part of their powers in successful efforts to keep a "full close" out of their music. They are like bats flying over a plain, not daring to touch the ground through inability to take wing again. The orchestral selections at this concert were the introduction and closing scene from Tristan und Isolde, Beethoven's Leonora overture, and the same master's Eighth Symphony. These, for the most part, had a fine rendering, the principal exception being the minuet and trio of the symphony, which have been heard to greater advantage. Frau Malten and Herr Gura, of the German Opera, Drury Lane, contributed the vocal music in a style that suggested the desirableness of limiting their efforts to the Wagnerian stage. Herr Richter conducted with customary masterfulness.

MR GANZ'S CONCERTS.—St James's Hall was well filled on Saturday afternoon, when the fourth of these concerts took place. Regarding the principal feature in the programme—the Symphonie Fantastique of Hector Berlioz—there is no need to speak at length. On former occasions we have sought to do justice to the fancy and skill shown in the earlier portions of the work. At present these require no champion. The Reverie and Passions, the Bal, the Scène aux Champs, and, in large measure, the Marche au Supplice, are understood and admired to the full extent of their deserts. On the other hand it may be necessary to warn the many who are in danger of having their perception of true music perverted by rhodomontade, that the fifth part, Songe d'une Nuit de Sabbat, is not music at all, but rather an illustration of the rebellion of music against an unwise effort to employ it for purposes and in a manner foreign to its nature. All such attempts recoil upon those who make them. Here, for instance, a fine work is spoiled by an ending possible to the muse only when in a state of delirium tremens. It is a fearful example, and should be nailed to the doors of concert rooms as dead kites were once displayed in farmyards—pour encourager les autres. The performance was on the whole good. We can conceive a more delicate and graceful rendering of the "Ball" scene, but when power and precision seemed all important, those qualities were not wanting.

With the French composer's symphony came a French pianist in the always welcome person of Mdme Montigny Rémaury, a lady qualified to represent, wherever she goes, the legitimate school of her art. Mdme Rémaury's taste is not restricted. She can recognize all that is good in new works; but her keenest sympathies remain with the great masters, with Beethoven above all. She is, we believe, the only pianist who of late years has cared to perform that master's first concerto in London. No doubt the work is old-fashioned, according to the theories we are now asked to accept. It is certainly melodious, symmetrical, and beautiful; but Mdme Rémaury is not on that account ashamed of it. This, indeed, may have been the reason why she played it on Saturday afternoon, and why she did so with all the grace and brilliancy which the work demands. A more precise or neater finger than Mdme Rémaury's no pianist is fortunate enough to own, nor can any interpret a "classic" so as to make its structure and meaning more clear. This was frankly recognized by the audience, the applause bestowed being at once cordial and amply invited.

Following the French pianist came Mdlle Marianne Eisller, a violinist who has journeyed from Vienna to win, if haply she may, the approval of English amateurs. The young lady chose a well-known theme in the Adagio from Spohr's Ninth Concerto, and, as she played only that movement, it is manifestly impossible to judge of her full pretensions. From what she did, however, it seemed clear that Mdlle Eisller has the all-important gift of musical sensibility and taste. Her delivery of some of the phrases, towards the close of the Adagio in particular, was marked by decided and appropriate expression. Assuming that the young lady's executive skill is on a par with her natural powers, she deserves the attention which may, hereafter, be more fully accorded. The vocalist at this concert was Madame Patey, whom we cannot too highly praise for a perfect delivery of Sarti's melodious arietta, "Lungi dal caro bene." —D. T.

Mdme Sophie Menter.—A large and critical audience assembled at St James's Hall on Friday afternoon, June 2, to listen to the interpretation, by Mdme Sophie Menter, of a programme embracing works widely different in character and merit. Beethoven's Sonata (Op. 81), Les Adieux, l'Absence, et le Retour, occupied, as it should, the most prominent place, and called forth the entire resources of the fair executant. The first movement, Les Adieux, seemed instinct with the accents of tender regret, and was rendered with full significance, as well as perfect manipulation; the second, L'Absence, gave still further evidence of the lady's thorough grasp of her subject; whilst the third showed what entire mastery she possesses over the key-board. Mdme Menter's playing in a Pastorale and Allegro Vivacissimo, by Domenico Scarlatti, proved, in another fashion, no less remarkable. Judging by the large space allotted to Chopin, that idealistic composer must be a great favourite with the pianist. From the six pieces performed consecutively we select the second, fourth, and last for special notice. The Etude in G flat was rapturously encored, the Ballade in G minor afforded almost equal pleasure, and seldom has the Valse Brillante in A flat been played with greater fluency. The programme was made up largely of "arrangements." First came the Toccata and Fugue, for organ (Bach), arranged by Tausig for the pianoforte; then Mendelssohn's "On song's bright pinions," followed by Schubert's "Fleurs fanées" and "Erl King," arranged by Liszt. Whilst acknowledging that these concoctions have merit in their way, we confess to little perception of a real artistic value, and question the propriety of making the melodies of great masters ground-work for mere fantastic decoration. Liszt's Rhapsodies, played with marvellous power and skill, nevertheless failed to command much respect. In speaking of Mdme Sophie Menter's extraordinary talents no "if" or "but" is needed to qualify high praise.—P. G.

Signor Tito Mattei's Concert.—The Marlborough Rooms were crowded on Saturday afternoon, at the invitation of Signor Tito Mattei. This highly-respected professor generally provides some novelty, and on this occasion a "new waltz-galop (de concert)" afforded him an opportunity of displaying his talents in the double capacity of composer and executant. Moreover, he rarely omits to bring forward singers and players who are but little known to the public. On Saturday three such artists appeared, and are certainly worthy of better acquaintance. First, Signor Palmieri, in "Questa o quella" (Verdi), showed himself the possessor of an agreeable voice; and, next, Mdlle Perretti, who selected "Nacqua all' affano" (Rossini), displayed an organ of considerable compass, with evidence of assiduous training, that in the end will, no doubt, bring success. The song chosen was, perhaps, too trying for a young beginner, but the difficulties were, in most cases, fairly surmounted. Mr Leigh-Bennett, in "Vorrei morire" (Tosti), also gave signs of coming excellence; Miss Orridge's fine voice, and Mdme Rose Hersee's charming talents were duly appreciated; while Mr Maybrick sang "The Little Hero" (Stephen Adams) in so touching a manner as to secure the warmest approbation. Mdlle Rosina Isidor, Mr Maas, Signor Foli, Signor Runcio, and other popular vocalists were announced, the instrumentalists being Signor Papini, Signor Albert, Signor Li Calsi, and Signor Pinsuti.—P. G.

W. C. A. Ehrenfechter.—A matinée musicale was given by this gentleman on Wednesday last at his residence in Earl's Court Road. Mr Ehrenfechter we presume to be a professor of standing in the district in which he lives, and that he enjoys credit and respect in his vocation may be inferred from the large attendance vouchsafed to him upon the present occasion by his friends and patrons. In the course of the matinée he gave examples of his qualifications as a solo pianist and composer, and it will readily be believed he was not listened to without compliment. Violin and violoncello performances, and a round of vocalisms by Mdme Vogri, Miss Berta Foresta, and Mr D'Arcy Ferris, (with whose name we confess to be unfamiliar, but who seemed to be in excellent vogue with the visitors present), contributed the remaining incidents of the concert.—H.

Miss Emelie Lewis's concert on Wednesday evening at Steinway Hall was fully attended. The young singer has made great progress since we last heard her, rendering on the occasion under notice Mercadante's "Il sogno" (violoncello obbligato, Mr J. A. Brousil) with fluency and expression. Miss Lewis also contributed Milton Welling's "Dreaming" and Behrend's "Firelight Fancies," besides joining Mdme Liebhart in Oberthür's duet, "Wir Wandern aus dem Vaterland." In each of these Miss Lewis was warmly and deservedly applauded. Mdme Liebhart pleased her audience, as she invariably does, with G. B. Allen's "Little bird so sweetly singing" (flute obbligato, by the bye, capitally played by Herr Wustemann). Mr Herbert Thorndike was at his best in a pleasing song by Mina Gould (whose "Time of Roses" is so universally popular). Miss Carrie Lawrence gave an Irish recitation, "Shemus O'Brian," which she was called upon to repeat, but she gave "Old Maids and Old Bachelors" instead. Besides the singers we have named, Misses Alice Fairman and Eleanor Crux, together with Signor Villa, gave various songs and duets, and Miss Maggie Okey played with Mdlle Brousil and Mr Brousil a trio for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello; Miss Okey afterwards contributing one of Liszt's "Rhapsodies," and Mr Brousil solos on the violoncello by Weber and Popper. Signors Romili, Samuelli, and Denza, Messrs C. Ryal and Davieson accompanied.

Signor Muratori is to be congratulated on the success of the concert he gave on Wednesday morning (by kind permission of Mrs J. R. Campbell), at The Holme, Regent's Park—congratulated not only for its musical success, but for the valuable assistance granted him by several of his fair amateur pupils, whose beautiful fresh voices were heard with such charming effect in the compositions selected for their performance, among which must specially be noticed Signor Muratori's trio, "Oh! Dei che dolce incanto" (Mrs Aston, Mrs Stone, and Signor Rizzelli); Rossini's trio, "L'usato ardir" (by the same fair lady amateurs and Mr Noyes); Campana's duetto, "Una sera d'amore" (Miss Foster and Miss M. Foster); Signor Muratori's Romanza "Amore" (Mrs Stone), the violin obbligato part to which was finely played by Signor Scuderi; Verdi's duet, "Se m'ami ancor" (Mrs Aston and Signor Rizzelli); Signor Muratori's Valse, "L'Amante"—"The Lovers' Waltz," (Mrs Aston); Mr Farmer's song, "Shall I wear a white Rose?" (Mrs Stone); and several other popular songs, not forgetting Mercadante's aria, "Ah! s'estinto," beautifully rendered by Mrs Aston. Certainly Signor Muratori may be envied for the esteem he is held in by those who have placed themselves under his tuition.

Mr Oberthur gave a matinée musicale at the Marlborough Rooms on Tuesday, June 6th, assisted by Mdmes Liebhart, Vogri, and Doré-Desvignes, Signor Luigi Conti, Messrs Alfred Hemming and Frank Quatremayne, as vocalists; and, as instrumentalists, by Mdlle Gayrard Pacini (pianoforte), Herr Carl Henkel (violin), and M. Albert (violoncello). The interest of the matinée was concentrated in the compositions of Mr Oberthür, which included his Trio in F minor, for violin, violoncello, and harp; his duet, for violin and harp, on subjects from Der Freyschütz; his Concertino for the harp (the orchestral parts, on this occasion, being arranged for the pianoforte and played by Mdlle Gayrard-Pacini); and several of his songs, among them, "The Babe and the Sunbeam" (Mdlle Doré-Desvignes), "A Noble Knight" (Mr Frank Quatremaine), "The Discovery" (Mdme Liebhart), and his romance, "The Rose and the Ring" (Mr Alfred Hemming). It is scarcely necessary to say, Mr Oberthür's talent as a composer being well known, that both the instrumental and vocal pieces were attentively listened to and heard with pleasure, receiving the applause due to their exceptional merits. Among the miscellaneous songs was Blumenthal's "Evening Song," rendered with great expression by Mr Alfred Hemming, who, a few years ago, was well known and esteemed in our concert-rooms, and who has just returned from a long sojourn in Russia, with voice neither injured by time nor climate. The concert gave perfect satisfaction to a full and fashionable audience, among whom we noticed many distinguished amateurs and admirers of the harp, on which instrument Mr Oberthür is so accomplished an executant.

THE MISSES KINGDON.—A matinée musicale was given on Saturday June 3, at 31 Maida Hill West, in aid of the London Fever Hospital. The programme included Schumann's "Dichter liebe" and several pianoforte duets, rendered with thorough accuracy, taste and expression by the Misses Kingdon, two accomplished amateurs, organizers of the entertainment. The ladies in every instance won merited applause.

PROVINCIAL.

TAUNTON.—The concert given by the Taunton Philharmonic Association in the London Hotel Assembly Rooms on Thursday evening, June 1st, may be pronounced in every respect a decided success. The performance was of a high character, reflecting credit upon all who took part therein, and the attendance was large, fashionable, and appreciative. The works selected for presentation were Sterndale Bennett's Woman of Samaria for the first part of the programme, and G. A. Macfarren's delightful cantata May-day for the second, and the leading passages in both were capitally rendered, the solos being very nicely given, and the choruses for the most part displaying a degree of steadiness, speaking of careful and painstaking training on the part of the conductor, Mr Thomas F. Dudeney. The soloists were:—Misses May Bell and French; Messrs Theo. Taylor and W. J. Trenchard. Miss Simmons officiating as pianist and general accompanist, left nothing to be desired. We may heartily congratulate all concerned upon this concert being one of the most attractive and artistic the association has yet brought before their patrons and the public.

CHESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL.—On Wednesday morning the Chester Musical Festival commenced with Mendelssohn's Elijah, given in the cathedral. The city was gaily decorated; the showery weather, however, somewhat interfered with the pleasure of the visitors. There was a band and chorus of 250, with Mr Joseph C. Bridge, organist of the cathedral, as conductor; Dr Rowland Rogers, of Bangor Cathedral, as organist; and Herr Strauss, as leader of the band, which was chiefly composed of members of Mr Charles Hallé's Manchester orchestra; the principals being Herren Strauss, Jacoby, Bernardt, and E. Vieuxtemps. The chorus was selected from Chester, York, Durham, Ripon, Manchester, and Hereford Cathedrals. The proceedings opened with the Hundredth Psalm, specially arranged for this festival as a motet for eight voices by Dr Pole. The principal singers in the oratorio were Miss Marriott, Mdme Mudie-Bolingbroke, Mdme Patey, and Messrs Maas and King. In the evening, Acis and Galatea was given at the Music Hall.

GERMAN OPERA, DRURY LANE.

Die Meistersinger was represented a second time on Saturday night, with important changes in the caste, Fräulein Malten being substituted for Frau Sucher (Eva) and Herr Nachbaur for Herr Winkelmann (Stolzing). These changes do not imply the smallest public or managerial dissatisfaction with the artists temporarily set aside, rather do they point to a fact which Richard Wagner persistently overlooks. The human voice is not an instrument of wood or brass, nor are human lungs made of leather. He, therefore, who takes a prominent part in one of the "reformer's" music-dramas resembles a sentry on duty with the thermometer below zero. His "go" is a short one, but short as it may be he cannot get rid of an uncomfortable reflection that duty, in such a case, means mischief.* Verdi was once accused of an intent to destroy singing on the Italian stage, but he is a mere Fifth of November effigy compared with the genuine Guy Fawkes of Bayreuth. No doubt German lungs are strong, and German throats lend themselves more to shouting than to singing, but even a Teutonic artist is not qualified to do the work of a fog-horn. His capacity knows limits, and if there are to be four Parsifals at Bayreuth next August, why should there not be two Stolzings and two Evas at Drury Lane? Comparisons between Frau Sucher and Fräulein Malten, or between Herr Winkelmann and Herr Nachbaur, would be as ungracious as the impulse to indulge in them is natural. We shall resist the impulse and avoid the ungraciousness, a course the more readily followed because neither Eva nor Stolzing is a character of first-rate dramatic importance. Wagner usually makes his lovers the real hero and heroine of the plays to which they belong, but the lovers in Die Meistersinger are feeble folk, of very little beyond musical consequence, wherefore criticism upon them must be musical chiefly, and here some will contend for the superiority of Fräulein Malten as a more intellectual artist than Frau Sucher, while it is just possible that the feeble tones of Herr Nachbaur strike a chord unresponsive to the strenuous declamation of Herr Winkelmann. After all, it matters little. The case may be summed up—at any rate, as regards the ladies—in the familiar lines, "How happy could I be with either, Were t'other dear charmer away." In other respects the original cast remained unchanged on Saturday, so that we again witnessed Herr Gura's masterly embodiment of the cobbler-poet, Hans Sachs, and again regretted that the clever artist was hampered by extreme prosiness. There should be one edition of Die Meistersinger for Germany, and another for countries whose people cannot take a lively interest in frequent preachments about German art. True, Sachs is not such a terrible bore as Wotan. The Nuremberg tradesman does not require us to hear interminable narratives concerning family doings connected with which there are bars sinister enough to make a gridiron for Fafner and Fasolt. But he does talk, and talk so much that even Herr Gura can hardly save him from the unenviable distinction supremely won and worn by the Scandinavian god. Herr Gura, as Beckmesser, labours under no such disadvantage. Beckmesser is always welcome on the stage, never, when there, saying too much. He is a character distinguished by genuine comedy, and as a real comedian Herr Ehrke deals with him. A more finished impersonation our stage has seldom witnessed. It is complete to the last detail, every accent, gesture, and attitude being studied, yet with the art that keeps art invisible behind a close semblance of nature. Almost as warm praise is deserved by Herr Landau, upon whose David no one dreams of improvement. A grave and dignified Pogner in Herr Koegel, a finished Kothner in Dr Kraus, and a capital Magdalene in Fräulein Schefsky, complete a representation worthy the work which comes to us as Wagner's most genial and pleasant representative. Of the chorus, orchestra, and stage management no praise could be too great. The rendering of the music is a genuine triumph for Herr Richter—the noblest he has won in this country, while the animation of the stage, due to the fact that every person engaged is an actor, reflects credit not only upon its management, but upon all concerned. Should the German opera season be remembered for only one thing, that thing will be the performance of Die Meistersinger.—D. T.

ELECTRICITY AND MUSIC.—At the monthly meeting of the Musical Association, held on Monday last, Mr C. E. Stephens in the chair, a paper was read by H. Hills, Mus. Doc., entitled "From Rhythmic Pulsation to Classical Outline." After this, a "music electrograph," invented by J. Föhr, of Stuttgardt, was exhibited and described by Mr T. L. Southgate. The apparatus writes down on a band of paper unwound from a cylinder by clockwork any music played extemporaneously on a pianoforte to which it may be attached. This result is attained by the current staining the paper, chemically prepared for this purpose, a blue colour on the parts of the music staff corresponding to the position of the notes struck. The duration of the sounds is indicated by the length of the stains, and the positions of the bar lines are shown by depressing a pedal. —Times.

PRAGUE.—Smetana's opera, Libussa, has achieved an undoubted success. It is pronounced by competent judges to be his masterpiece. It was first produced on the 11th June, 1881, at the National Bohemian Theatre, burnt down two months subsequently. (The "Jettatore" had nothing to do with this catastrophe.—Dr Blinge.)

COPENHAGEN.—The members of the Private Pension Fund of the Ballet at the Theatre Royal lately held their annual meeting. During the past year the capital increased from 110,690 to 116,642 crowns. Three pensions, of 577,576, and 200 crowns respectively, were granted on the occasion.

BERLIN (Correspondence).—Experiments with the electric light have been carried on for some time at the Royal Operahouse. The Emperor Wilhelm, who attended the last performance of Mignon, was conducted by Von Hülsen, Intendant-General, to the machine-room, where Brandt, Inspector-in-Chief, fully explained the system to his Majesty, who expressed himself much interested.—The Central Skating Rink, at present occupied by an Italian opera company, will in future be permanently devoted to art. In the autumn, it will be transformed into a concert-room, where Bilse's old Orchestra, now at the "Charlottenburger Flora," will perform.—Carl Constantin Louis Grimm, the harpist, died on the 23rd ult., in his sixty-second year. Born in this capital on the 17th February, 1821, he applied himself from his eighth year to the harp, on which, thanks to the instruction received from our own Parish Alvars, he attained great proficiency. After playing for some time with success, he was appointed (in 1844) Royal Prussian Chamber-Musician and member of the band at the Royal Operahouse. On his 25th professional anniversary (1869) he had the title of Royal Concertmeister conferred on him. He subsequently retired on his pension, and gave his whole attention to the musical instrument manufactory established by his father.

TERESA TITIENS.

A Sketch.

"On October the 3rd, 1877, at her residence, 51, Finchley New-Road, after many weeks of severe suffering, Teresa Tietjens, aged 46 years. Friends will kindly accept this intimation."

Among the many stars who, from Mara downwards, have shone in the firmament of Italian opera, some few, perhaps, under certain conditions, may have been greater, others as great, none have occupied a position so unique, as the subject of the above simple obituary notice. Mademoiselle Teresa Tietjens, or Titiens, to use the spelling which she adopted, on her arrival in this country, was a native of Hamburg, and made her first public appearance, at the principal theatre of that city, in a German version of Lucrezia Borgia, in 1847. Advancing by the usual progessive stages, in Frankfort and elsewhere, she worked her way to the Carinthia Theatre, at Vienna, where she filled a leading position during some years, until discovered and engaged by the late Mr Lumley. She made her début in London, at the old Her Majesty's Theatre, on Tuesday, the 13th of April, 1858, as Valentine, in Les Huguenots, and was at once recognized as one of the most interesting, and exceptionally-endowed singers of modern times.

The following are the thirty-three operas in which, during nearly twenty seasons, Mdlle Teresa Titiens has been heard in London:—Iphigenia en Tauride (Gluck), Fidelio (Beethoven), Medea, I Due Giornati (Cherubini), Don Giovanni, Le Nozze di Figaro, Il Flauto Magico, Il Seraglio (Mozart), Les Huguenots, Robert le Diable, Le Prophète (Meyerbeer), Oberon, Der Freischütz (Weber), Lohengrin (Wagner), Martha (Flotow), Falstaff (Nicolai), Faust, Mirella (Gounod), Hamlet (Thomas), Semiramide (Rossini), Norma, I Puritani (Bellini), Lucrezia Borgia, Lucia di Lammermoor, Anna Bolena, La Favorita (Donizetti), Ernani, I Lombardi, Il Trovatore, I Vespri Siciliani, La Forza del Destino, Un Ballo in Maschera (Verdi), and Nicolo di Lapi (Schira). In 1859, she sang at Drury Lane, and in 1860, at Her Majesty's, under Mr E. T. Smith. In 1861, she was at the Lyceum, for Mr Mapleson's first season of management, and was again at Her Majesty's Theatre, in 1862, where she remained, until its destruction by fire, in 1867. In 1868 she was a leading member of Mr Mapleson's company at Drury Lane, and sang in 1869-70—the years of the famous opera-coalition—at Covent Garden. Subsequently she was with her old manager, Mr Mapleson, at Drury Lane, for six seasons, and finally inaugurated the new "Old House," in the Haymarket last spring, soon after which illness incapacitated her from the further discharge of her duties.

Although regarded, on her arrival in London, as the more than probable inheritrix of the Pasta-Grisi repertory, the new comer did not, at the outset, fulfil every condition, requisite for that position. Her personal appearance certainly marked her out for this line, and, in addition to unmistakable dramatic instincts, her voice, a true soprano, even in every note of its extensive register, at that time combined sweetness, and liquid purity, with an almost colossal power. But there was still something wanting. Nurtured in all the traditions of the German school, Mdlle Titiens had yet to acquire the Italian method, and so make good her claim to a first place on the Italian stage. Hence her earliest successes were obtained in Les Huguenots, Don Giovanni, and Le Nozze di Figaro. In Il Trovatore, her Leonora was freely criticised, but a few weeks later the Lucrezia excited new interest, as affording evident proof of progress, and as foreshadowing that excellence, in music of the Italian school, to which, from this date, she steadily advanced. To follow, step by step, the career of this incomparable singer, or to comment in detail upon each part of her wide répertoire, would be impossible, within these limits, but the following notes may be of interest. The fine-ladyism of Martha sat awkwardly upon Titiens, as being something wholly foreign to her nature, yet all London went to hear "The Last Rose of Summer," sung as, perhaps, it was never sung before—as probably it will never be again. Who can forget the tender charm of her "Qui la voce," as the heart-stricken Elvira, in I Puritani; or the splendour of her mad scene, in Lucia, when having surpassed herself in the largo, which exhausts the resources of so many singers, she would advance with unimpaired vigour to the footlights, and in the cabaletta, "Spargi d'amour," attack, and sustain, for some momenis, a B in alt. with all the clearness of a silver bell? These parts were long since laid aside by Titiens, but their recollection is ineffaceable. Her Valentine, Donna Anna, and Contessa d'Almaviva, were from the first held to be super-excellent; indeed, we always considered her rendering of the two airs, "Porgi amor" and "Dove sono"—belonging to the last-named part—for perfect phrasing, just accent, and exact measurement of time, to be amongst her very finest vocal achievements. As years went on, the supremacy of her Norma, Semiramide, and Lucrezia Borgia, operas of the purely Italian school, became equally established; and there were other events in the operatic reign of Titiens too important, as landmarks, to be passed over. Such were her Reizia in Oberon, revived in 1860; her Alice, in Robert le Diable, which created, in 1862, as great a sensation as that of Jenny Lind, some fifteen years before; and her Fidelio, in 1864, when old habitués recalled Cruvelli, Malibran, and Schroeder-Devrient, only to find their latest successor no whit inferior by the comparison. But the greatest achievement of all was on the production of Cherubini's Medea, in 1865.* when she proved, past doubt or cavil, that the highest walk of lyric tragedy was within her means. Many as were her subsequent successes, Titiens may be said to have reached, in this part, the apex of her artistic renown. To her, also, we probably owe the introduction of Gounod's Faust to this country. Titiens was the original Marguerite in London; and though physically unsuited to the character, she was, both in singing and acting, the very ideal of Goethe's heroine. Owing to the declining popularity of the lighter class of operatic music, and to her all-absorbing attraction in grand opera, few were aware of her talents as a comedian, since the opportunities of witnessing them were so rare. None, however, who heard that opera, will fail to remember her Mrs Ford, in Nicolai's Falstaff. Here her acting was not only in the finest spirit of comedy, but was marked by a humour, and a sense of enjoyment, for which only one parallel occurs to us—that of Mrs Keeley. And in later years, when she might well have been excused for reposing upon her well-earned laurels, Teresa Titiens assumed three new rôles, namely, Gertrude, in Ambroise Thomas's Hamlet, Leonora, in La Favorita, and Ortrud, in Lohengrin. In the first of these, she completely distanced the Ophelia (Mdlle Sessi) of the night, and worked up a part, hitherto looked upon as a mere lay figure, into a creation worthy of Shakspere. Her Leonora was, from first to last, superb; and she imparted to the repulsive character of Ortrud a dramatic significance which, now that she has departed, it may possibly never regain. But great as was the perfection to which Titiens attained in the Italian school, she never relinquished her predilection for the music of her Fatherland. To her, more than to any other, we owe the extended knowledge, and acceptance, of the German school of opera, in England. True that Don Giovanni, and Le Nozze di Figaro, had long been traditions of the operatic repertory at both houses, that the works of Meyerbeer had formed so many sheet anchors, in the earlier seasons, at Covent Garden. It is to Titiens, however, that we are indebted for the revivals of the Oberon and Der Freischütz of Weber, the Flauto Magico and Seraglio of Mozart, besides the Iphigenia of Gluck, whose Armida was also—had her health allowed it—to have formed a leading feature in the late season at the Haymarket. And these, with others, paved the way for the introduction of Herr Wagner's compositions—with what real result, however, yet remains to be seen.

Enough, then, has been told to prove the industry, no less than the abilities of this great singer. That which gives her an unique place in the musical annals of this country has not hitherto been sufficiently shown. Others, we think all her predecessors, have come, from season to season, to London, and during the intervening months have repaired to Paris, St Petersburg, Moscow, and other cities, which maintain large operatic establishments. Mdlle Titiens, it is true, returned to Vienna, to complete her term, after her first engagement with Lumley; she went also to Naples for the carnivals of 1863-4; and to America, on a concert tour, in the autumn of 1875; but with these exceptions, and those of two short visits to Paris and Barcelona, she has, we believe, spent the whole of the last nineteen years in this kingdom. And in identifying herself thus completely with England it was natural that she should direct her attention to another branch of her art, more popular in this country than in any other—we mean oratorio singing. The mantle of Grisi had fallen upon Titiens, the diadem of Clara Novello was also to encircle her brow. In brief, she soon shone supreme alike in sacred and secular song. To follow her triumphs, in this line, were endless, but to give only two examples we vividly recall the sublime manner in which she led the trio, "Lift thine eyes to the mountains," in Elijah; the earnestness and the deep religious feeling with which she rendered "I know that my Redeemer liveth," in The Messiah—at the Birmingham Musical Festival of 1870.

Time, which spares none, eventually detracted something from the power and fulness of her voice, but, to the last, Teresa Titiens continued to outshine all her workfellows, since, to the last, she was able to bring the impress of a great mind to bear upon everything which she attempted, and, in the fulfilment of her artistic duties, to evince neither carelessness nor fatigue. There was no such thing as second-best, in the organization of this transcendent woman. She would sing with the same care and heartiness, in the dilapidated old Assembly-Room of Truro, as before the most brilliant of metropolitan audiences. She had been the mainstay of the old Haymarket Opera in its concluding years, it was therefore only in the fitness of things that she should be chosen to inaugurate the new Her Majesty's Theatre, at the beginning of the late season. The overwhelming cheer which burst from every corner of the building as Norma entered, in the second scene of that opera, was proof enough, were any wanting, of the perennial popularity of the diva. But gloriously as she sang, on this and the three or four following evenings, it was already known to the members of her own family, that the hand of death was near; that the night "when no man can work" had come for Titiens, as it will for all; and that when the curtain fell upon her last performance of Lucrezia Borgia—on Saturday, the 19th of May—it descended also upon her professional career.

It has been affirmed that artists have no private life. Their every action, from earliest years, is subjected to the censorship of a public, ever ready to be severe upon every shortcoming, whilst, too seldom, reflecting upon the fiery ordeal of temptation to which they are, from their very birth, exposed. But if the faults of the profession are thus ruthlessly laid bare, it should be added also, in all honesty, that their good qualities are, of necessity, manifested, and acknowledged, in a corresponding degree. It is pleasant, then, to be able to add, that Mdlle Titiens had, during her long and distinguished career, won the love and esteem of all who knew her. An exemplary daughter, a kind sister, she was further known to be the most generous, amiable, and self-sacrificing of her sex. It was a byword of the coulisses that, "to quarrel with Titiens were to effect the impossible." The airs and affectations which disfigure so many of her operatic sisters, were as things quite apart from Titiens. She was altogether above them. None who approached her could be insensible to her peculiar charm of manner; for it was characterized by a quiet dignity, and a simple grace which were the outward expression of innate good-breeding. And the unselfishness which was, through life, one of her most striking attributes, was evident to the last. On the recurrence of each paroxysm of pain she banished her relatives and attendants from the sick room; for she would not unnerve them by the sight of her sufferings. And now the great singer has gone to her long home; but it is with the extinction of memory alone that the fame of Teresa Titiens will ever die.

October, 1877. MICHAEL WILLIAMS.

M. ALPHONSE THIBAUD.—Le Journal des Débats, writing about this young artist at one of M. Pasdeloup's Concerts Populaires, says:—"The success of the last concert was that of M. Alphonse Thibaud, a young virtuoso, who hardly numbers twenty years, yet played with uncommon vigour Rubinstein's Fourth Concerto. He possesses not only great power, but rapid and neat execution, never playing a false note. These are the qualities which distinguished his performance and brought down an enthusiastic ovation. We are convinced that in a few years' time this young pianist will attain a high position in the artistic world.

When Mdme Pauline Lucca arrived in London, and her maid went to the Custom House, for the purpose of attending the examination of luggage, it was discovered that the whole of it, including all her opera costumes, had been destroyed in the vessel which was burnt at Queenborough Pier. This unfortunate loss placed Mr Gye in great difficulty, as he naturally hesitated to communicate such unpleasant news to the prima donna, fearing it might prevent her promised appearance as Carmen in the evening. Mdme Lucca was therefore not informed of the accident, and special dresses for the character were immediately ordered. Her luggage had been insured for £500.

Mr Frederick Bowen Jewson's "Second Concerto," Op. 33 (Stanley Lucas, Weber & Co.).—Until opportunity is afforded of testing the quality of this composition through the medium of a complete performance, it would be premature to pronounce judgment on its merits. As a work of considerable importance, however, and the production of an English professor of long standing, a word of hearty welcome is its due. Something more than this may be accorded to its composer, who, in the midst of his manifold professional engagements, yet finds time for the service of the less lucrative branch of his art, and Mr Jewson will have his reward in the respect of his brother professors, and the increased weight of his authority over those whose studies he is called upon to direct. The concerto has three movements: Allegro moderato in E—triple time; Andante con moto in G—common time; and the Finale allegro vivace in E, in which we recur to triple time. The pianoforte part, which may be described as brilliant throughout, is written with the technical skill of a pianist, and if the concerto is scored with equal efficiency, it should produce a good effect in performance.—The Queen.

"Miss Lillie Albrecht, the talented young composer and pianist, has again given her many friends and admirers an additional proof of her musical abilities, by the production of the 'Fantaisie Marziale,' a Morceau de Salon, for the pianoforte. We regard this work as one of the best that Miss Albrecht has yet done, displaying a rare amount of skill and talent; and this latest production will add greatly to the high reputation she has so deservedly gained. From a musical point of view it is charmingly spirited, and will doubtless receive due appreciation from all who really love first-class music. This young lady is well known in musical circles, and her skilful instrumentation is as clever as her compositions are excellent."—"The Court Circle," May, 1882.

"Messrs Boosey & Co. have done good service not only to amateurs but to art, by including in their series of volumes of national melodies 'The Songs of Scandinavia' and 'The Songs of Eastern Europe.' The first-named contains eighty-three examples; and the second, a hundred. We need not insist upon the importance of collections like these, whatever the country they represent; but we must say that no musical library is complete without the songs of Scandinavia and Eastern Europe. The editor, Mr J. A. Kappey, has taken great pains to secure melodies of a genuinely representative character, and at a time when attention is becoming more and more directed to folk-tunes as a source of new thematic ideas, the volumes in question are of peculiar value. They have our most hearty commendation, the 'Songs of Eastern Europe' more especially, since the volume contains, besides examples of Liszt, Chopin, and other masters, a very valuable collection of volkslieder from the hitherto untouched wealth of the Austrian provinces."—Daily Telegraph.

"Messrs Boosey & Co. have published two additional volumes of their National Songs, which appear likely to be the most interesting of the series. We know little of the rich repertory of Scandinavian Songs, and Mr and Miss Kappey, the editors of these books, are to be thanked for introducing some of the best specimens to public notice. Five of the Russian songs are so old as to be traditional; and in the series are to be found a beautiful Cossack lullaby by one Bachmetieff, a gipsy song by Lvoff, and several songs by Warlamoff. These and the Polish songs (all of which are traditional) may be considered among the most interesting items of a small but acceptable collection. Two ancient Lithuanian songs, a couple of Finnish, and four ancient Norwegian melodies, will likewise be found in the book. The majority of the Swedish songs are by Lindblad, that prolific song writer, who died in 1864. Tradition says that the old melody of 'The Beggar Boy' was once sung in the days when she was a poor child by the distinguished artist now known as Mdme Christine Nilsson. Included in the Danish songs is the traditional 'Dannebrog,' the music of which is attributed to one 'Bay.' It would be interesting to inquire the foundation for this statement, as the origin of the Danish National Anthem was generally understood to be unknown. The tradition of the 'Dannebrog Banner,' which, in 1719, fell down from heaven to bring victory to the Danish arms, is duly recorded in a footnote. Most of the Dutch songs given date back to the sixteenth century; and there are besides three songs by W. F. G. Nicolai, and one Flemish song. Altogether eighty-three of the national songs of northern Europe are included in this valuable and interesting book. In future editions a larger preface or more footnotes, giving further particulars of the old songs whose history is known, would be welcome. Equally interesting are the songs of Eastern Europe, recently issued by Messrs Boosey, and likewise edited by Mr and Miss Kappey. Among the thirty-four Austrian songs, the large majority are volkslieder, and they include Tyrolean, Styrian, and Polish songs, two of them by Chopin. These are followed by twenty-three characteristic specimens of Hungarian songs, giving a very fair idea of the peculiarities of Hungarian music, and comprising modern songs by Liszt, and some traditional songs of Bosnia, Moravia, and Dalmatia. The first of the Bohemian songs is the 'War-song of the Hussites,' once, it is believed, the national song of the country. A few specimens of Servian, Swiss, Greek, and even Turkish melodies. The last are very peculiar; and the peculiar intervals common to this and other Eastern music are claimed by some to have been handed down direct from the music of the ancient Hebrews."—Figaro.

Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. CHESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

Chester, June 8.

The second Chester Musical Festival began this morning under very favourable circumstances, and with hopeful prospects of a very successful meeting. The weather indeed was showery, but the sunshine came conveniently for the crowds in the streets who found their pleasure in watching the visitors on the way to the Cathedral, and for the visitors themselves who strolled about the old city during the long interval between the parts of Elijah. A very large audience filled the body of the nave and its broad aisles, and on all sides there was emphatic evidence that the festival was a city celebration—one in which the ecclesiastical, the municipal, and social sections of the community were all taking pride.

If any town in England is fit for artistic revels, Chester certainly is. Nowhere else have the conditions of a remote antiquity survived in more picturesque fashion, and in no other city do the old and the new combine with so little of the incongruous. Chester is in fact, a busy, active, modern place—far less sleepy than some cathedral cities; yet, if we could imagine a return of the old mediæval processions, no other city would afford so appropriate a setting for the pomp of feudalism and the masquers and mummers of bygone times. The old half timbered houses with their high peaked roofs, their picturesque gables, so rich in fantastic beams and parquetted fronts, and the always wonderful "rows," bring up memories of other centuries, which are the more vivid on days like this, when the city is unusually gay with bunting, and otherwise bedecked with extraordinary finery, while the church bells clang welcome to hundreds of visitors who arrive in the morning trains.

The great abbey of St Werburgh, which Henry VIII. converted into a cathedral, has been the scene of many famous events, and a chronicle of all the feasts within its walls or under the shadow of its massive tower would be a tolerably complete record of the manners and customs, and anything but a prosy or obscure page of the history of England. As one listened to the thrilling tones of the organ while the visitors were assembling in the cathedral this morning, it was pardonable and natural to look back to the merry-makings and feasts of other centuries, and, happily, Sir Gilbert Scott has banished none of the ghosts from the venerable building which he began to restore. The authentic records of Chester go back more than eighteen centuries. Caer Lleon had long been Chester when the Miracle plays were given within the walls of this great church, or in the adjoining abbey yard. The four nations—the French-speaking lords and their suites, the Latin-speaking churchmen, the English, and the Welsh—who were wont to gather when either in the abbey, or in the castle hard by, there were feasts or plays, were all represented this morning, but the contrast between the divisions of those days and the unity of to-day is even more decided than that between the festival performances of those centuries and this. For it is worth remembering that in both cases the object was to illustrate Scripture-history, and to accommodate it to the requirements and conditions of the age. We need no spoken dialogue in our cathedral performances now; no fantastic dresses; no representations of the Enemy of mankind and his agents; but Mendelssohn is not less potent as a magician than were the old chroniclers. He tells the story of Elijah's inspired career in language that stirs the soul and elevates the imagination. We hear the wailings of the despairing people, weeping for themselves and their children in the famine; the widow's anguish and her overwhelming joy are set before us almost as visions. We can all but see the frantic worshippers of Baal as we listen to their revels and hear them under the taunts of Elijah driven from defiant pride to the wildest despair. Nor is this terrible scene more vivid than the picture of the prophet on Mount Carmel, when his servant tells him of the little cloud, and he proclaims the end of the famine and the coming of the healing rain that "laveth the thirsty land." Again we have the wanderings in the wilderness, when the prophet, escaping from the vindictive Jezebel, offers the heart-broken prayer, "It is enough, now let me die," and at last the thrilling scene of the translation and "the fiery fiery chariots and fiery fiery horsemen." You will, I hope, forgive this optimist comparison, and it is, perhaps, as well when circumstances might suggest the lament of the laudator temporis acti to remember that if they built greater temples then, we have music more wonderful than Miracle plays now.

There was a little delay at the commencement of the performance. Mr J. C. Bridge, the conductor, stood waiting, bâton in hand, for a considerable time and it was more than ten minutes past the appointed hour when the signal was given. Introductory to the oratorio, there was a short service, and the sight of the great nave, flooded with sunshine during the singing of the hymn, "All people that on earth do dwell," to the Old Hundredth Psalm, was very imposing. The hymn was given as the first part of a motet for eight voices, written specially for this festival by Dr Pole, a successful "attempt to combine a free vocal composition with a familiar canto fermo," and the effect of the soprano voices singing the well-known hymn as an accompaniment to the "Jubilate" was remarkably striking. It is not necessary to discuss the performance of the oratorio at great length—though it should be remembered that an oratorio in a cathedral is very different from the same work heard anywhere else. Shortcomings not readily overlooked elsewhere are more easily pardoned where acoustical perfection cannot be expected. Mr Bridge was fortunate in his orchestra of 70 performers, which included a large number of the members of Mr Hallé's band, and they were very well placed between two of the mighty piers which support the arches of the transept. Behind them, however, the place of the choir was less fortunate, for though this was to the advantage of the audience in the south transept, it was impossible to estimate fairly the vocal strength of a choir singing immediately beneath the great tower, at the meeting place of three lofty vaults altogether unenclosed. Admitting the difficulty of submitting an accurate judgment under these circumstances, it may, however, be safely said that the strength of the men's voices was not commensurate with that of the women's and boys', and more than once the effect of a fine chorus was interfered with by the comparative weakness of the tenors and basses. Mr Bridge is a careful conductor, and he had evidently studied the oratorio with intelligence—but his reading of several of the more important choruses differs from that of other conductors, and it cannot be said that where he departed from the ordinary tempi the result was always a gain. The choral singing was most effective and satisfactory in the more devotional passages, and I might mention several admirable examples of massive and accurate part-singing; but in the more exacting descriptive choruses, such as that which tells of the storm and the fire and the earthquake, there was not always such adequate appreciation of the scene and the sentiment as is invariably expected at the great Yorkshire festivals, at Birmingham, and in choirs nearer home. The overture was splendidly played, and in the accompaniments, both general and obbligati, there was much to admire. The famous rush of the violins in the chorus, "Thanks be to God," created the usual impression, and in no concert-room are the brass wind instruments heard with such altogether satisfactory effect as in a lofty building like this. If I am not mistaken, when Mendelssohn wrote St Paul and Elijah, he thought of their performance in such edifices as the Thomas Church at Leipsic and the great church at Brunswick.

The solos this morning were all entrusted to competent singers, and I hope there is no improper insular pride in saying that, notwithstanding the fact of the blessings of a National College of Music being still in the future, the soloists were all born and educated in this country. Miss Annie Marriott took the whole soprano part. She sings with unfailing intelligence, and seems to have unbounded energy. Her voice is very powerful and extensive in range, and its quality is at its best so very fine that it is a pity she frequently forces it; probably she was afraid of not being heard in so large a building, but even in the "Sanctus" Miss Marriott might have exercised greater restraint with advantage. Mdme Mudie Bolingbroke sang the contralto music in the first part, and Mdme Patey in the second. Mdme Bolingbroke, whose voice has gained in volume since she was last heard in Manchester, has never sung with greater skill. Her impressive delivery of the recitatives and her rendering of "Woe unto them," was much admired. Your readers will probably think that Mdme Patey's singing in this oratorio is so well known that there is nothing new to be said about it. Yet this accomplished lady's magnificent rendering of the Jezebel music astonished even those who have heard it most frequently. It was positively thrilling; not a point was missed, not an emphasis overlooked. It is, of course, needless to say how Mdme Patey, who was in very fine voice, gave the most popular air in the oratorio, "Oh, rest in the Lord." Mr Maas, who sang the tenor solos, was also in excellent voice, and what this means we may readily imagine. In oratorio, at any rate, he never sang with greater taste, and never showed more entire appreciation of the composer's meaning. That Mr Maas was effective in the songs I need not say, but his declamation in the recitatives could also be heard in every corner of the Cathedral. Mr King, who undertook the music of Elijah, had of course a very difficult task, but few have made such steady and rapid progress, and he was always judicious and artistic. Mr King, whose voice has gained in power, now gives the great songs with much more dramatic force than formerly. More than a word of praise is due to Miss Miller, Mr Halliday, and Mr Cuzner, for their assistance in the concerted music, and the lady also deserves commendation for the efficient manner in which she sang the soprano solos of the Carmel scene. Dr. Roland Rogers, of Bangor, was the organist, and Mr Bridge, who may be congratulated on the success of the opening performance, was fortunate in securing so able a coadjutor.

It would be unjust to say nothing about the admirable arrangements for the ingress and egress of visitors, and the courtesy of the gentlemen who undertook laborious duties as stewards.

To-night, at the first of the concerts in the Music Hall, a fine performance of Handel's Acis and Galatea was given. A more attractive Galatea than the deservedly popular Miss Mary Davies could not have been desired, while as Acis and Polyphemus, Mr Guy and Mr Hilton were both heard at their best. In the short miscellaneous selection which followed Mdme Patey and Mr Maas were the vocalists.

FORM, OR DESIGN, IN VOCAL MUSIC.

Operas are divided into several classes, differing generally as to title in the various countries in which they have been cultivated.

In plan, the distinction lies in the treatment of the less lyrical portions of the dialogue. In one class this is in speaking recitative, with harpsichord, pianoforte, or 'cello and bass accompaniment; the more lyrical portions only being set in accompanied recitative and cantabile. In another class, it is spoken—not sung; in yet another class, the whole drama is treated continuously with music and the band in use throughout, varied, and with interludes according to the will of the composer. As to the use of speech in conjunction with a musical drama, we cannot altogether say that it is contrary to all Greek ideas—supposing that we hold to them as the standard—for a Greek writer about A.D. 160, says that, in his opinion, when the dialogue is sung by a character who shows sympathy and emotion it is good; but when a character like Hercules sings it is absurd.

In Italy, up to the production of Rossini's Otello, in 1816, all operas—whether serious or comic—were written in the first of the forms described above. The less lyrical parts of the dialogue were set in speaking recitative; and for the introduction of a scena or other designed piece of music, or at points of strong emotion, accompanied recitative was used, with band and interludes. In this manner Mozart's serious operas, Idomeneo and Don Giovanni, his comic operas, Cosi fan tutte, and Figaro, and the comic operas, Il Matrimonio Segreto of Cimarosa, and Il Barbiere of Rossini, were written. Rossini, in his serious opera, Otello (1816), discarded the speaking recitative with harpsichord accompaniment, and used the band throughout, setting all the dialogue with accompanied recitative; and from that time all Italian operas, both serious and comic, have been written in that form.

In the Neapolitan opera buffa, up to about fifty years ago, spoken dialogue was used; and in some performances of Italian comic operas in other places, up to the present time, some of the dialogue in the most comic situations is spoken. This practice is used even in operas like Rossini's Il Barbiere, in which the whole dialogue (with the exception, of course, of that portion which was in more important music) was set by the composer to speaking recitative; and it may, perhaps, be due to the somewhat elastic treatment of the speaking recitative by those who are skilled in the performance of it, and who, knowing that accent, and not harmony or melody, is the important part of recitative, feel that they may even improvise the notes of the recitative so long as they keep the right accent.

French operas are classed under two heads—grand opera and opera comique; either of which may be serious or comic. The former is the historical French opera, and its earliest examples the compositions of Cambert, from 1659. These were written after the manner of the early Florentine writers, Caccini and Peri, namely, the whole opera in recitative, with continuous accompaniment for a slight band, little more than a figured bass being written down. Lulli, after writing ballets and dance-music for the Court, followed, in 1672, with operas containing ballets, and with fuller accompaniments. After Lulli, came Rameau; and after him, Gluck and Piccini; and Gluck, writing for the French stage, put in practice the reform which he had previously applied to the Italian opera at Vienna. The French grand opera has always retained two principal characteristics, the one being the natural growth from the continuous instrumental accompaniments of Cambert and of the Florentine school, and the other from the days of Lulli, the writer of Court ballets; namely, the accompanied recitative for the whole of the dialogue, and the use of the ballet either incidental to the piece or incorporated in the action. The French opera has never had the speaking recitative with harpsichord accompaniment, which was adopted in the Italian opera at a later date than the Florentine writers. Examples of grand opera of the French school since Gluck's time have been written for the French stage by Paër, Cherubini (Anacreon and Ali Baba), Spontini (La Vestale and Olympia), Rossini (Le Conte Ory and Guillaume Tell), Auber (La Muette de Portici), Halévy, Berlioz, Meyerbeer, Donizetti (La Favorite), Balfe (L'Etoile de Seville), and Gounod.

The second kind of French opera, opéra comique, takes its name from the company by whom it was performed, and its construction from the necessity of being different to that used by the grand opera company. The first operas written for the younger institution were of the same kind as the grand opera. Objection was then made by the grand opera company that this was an infringement of the patent which they had held since the days of Lulli, and the new operas were forbidden. Then a system was devised for the actors to speak and, at certain points, to bring in a large placard on which were written words that the audience could read and could sing to some popular tune; and as the music was not sung on the stage, the patent was not infringed. After this, an arrangement was made that the construction of the operas given at the two houses should be different. Like the grand opera, the plot of the opéra comique may be either serious or cheerful; but, unlike the former, a certain portion must be spoken and not sung. This portion consists of the conversations, and corresponds exactly to that which in the old Italian opera is given in speaking recitative. The musical part of the opéra comique corresponds with the rest of the musical part of the Italian opera, and consists of accompanied recitative, airs, concerted pieces, and choruses, as settings of the more emotional, more lyric portions of the drama. Writers of this kind of opera were Méhul, Grétry, Cherubini (Les Deux Journées), Adam, Hérold, Auber (Fra Diavolo), Boieldieu, Meyerbeer (Dinorah and L'Etoile du Nord), Balfe (Le Puits d'amour and Quatre Fils d'Aymon), Donizetti (La Fille du Régiment).

A WALL WITH EYES AND EARS.

Mr Harry Wall looks so sharp after anything resembling infringement of copyright in songs, that for the epithet "Lynx-eye'd," as applied to a watchful person, might be henceforth substituted "Wall-eye'd." Further suggestion,—have a portrait of Mr Harry Wall as frontispiece to a Comic Copyright Song, with title, "Oh, for the Guardian Wall!"—

Oh, for the Guardian Wall!
The sharpest cuss of all!
I'll never forget
The night we met,
When I sang a song with the words well set
By Balfe: I the fee—which I wish he may get—Owe to the Guardian Wall!

But surely there must be some effective compositions over which he has no control. So let charitable amateurs look into other répertoires, remembering that only the Weakest go to the Wall. Punch.

Nothing yet has been definitively settled with regard to Angelo Neumann's projected autumn season at Her Majesty's Theatre. Nevertheless, Colonel Mapleson is in town.

GERMAN OPERA COMPANY, DRURY LANE.—We are informed that Messrs Franke and Pollini have arranged to give a concert on a grand scale at the Royal Albert Hall on Saturday afternoon, the 24th June, at three o'clock, when they will introduce to the public the whole of the artists and chorus of their fine company, who have been performing for some weeks past at Drury Lane with so much success. The orchestra will be largely increased for this occasion and conducted by Herr Hans Richter.—(Communicated.)

JOSEPH HAYDN.*

Herr C. F. Pohl—archivist and librarian, as we all know, of the Society of the Friends of Music, in Vienna—is the model of a conscientious and thoroughly efficient musical historian. He much prefers laying himself open to a charge of over precision—supposing him, by the way, to acknowledge such a charge—to allowing a volume of his Biography of Haydn to pass out of his hands as long as there may possibly glimmer in the distance any detail he has not investigated or substantiated. For this honourable reason he has made us wait some six years for the second volume of his Haydn,† after the first rendered us so eager to have the continuation. The first volume we noticed in these columns at the time (Christmas, 1875,) greeting it with sincere delight as an important addition to the wealth of our musical literature. We could not avoid uttering a slight lament over the first volume, nor can we help doing so now over the second, on account of its too great copiousness, and if (according to Ehlert's witty remark) brevity is the politeness of authors, we must characterise our friend Pohl—a thing which assuredly no one ever did before—as deficient in that quality. Having eased our critical conscience with this outburst, we can from the bottom of our heart praise, and only praise, Pohl's Second Volume. It contains much that is new and interesting. In the First Volume, we lived with Haydn during the years of his childhood in Rohrau and Hainburg, and then accompanied the young chorister to the choir of St Stephen's, Vienna, following with sympathy the joyless and laborious period of his early career.

There is a peculiar irony of fate in the fact that Haydn, whom people are so ready to reproach with belonging to the "pigtail" school, should have been expelled the choir because, carried away by the high spirits of youth, he cut off the cue of a fellow pupil. Hungry and frozen, he then found himself, deserted by everyone, in the streets. We know what followed: the first unhoped for assistance rendered by the honest people who enabled him to take a small garret in the Michaelhaus and the good fortune which brought him together with two celebrated men, Metastasio and Porpora, who lived in it. At the end of the First Volume, we left him as chapelmaster to Prince Paul Antony Esterhazy at Eisenstadt. The Second Volume commences with Haydn and the Prince's musical establishment going to Esterhazy and a graphic description of the place. That great lover of magnificence, Prince Nicolaus, had made his palace of Esterhazy arise as though by magic from out a swamp, and embellished it till it was a second Versailles. At the present day, everything is again desolate and deserted, only the ruins of former magnificence telling of its splendour when Haydn lived there. The Prince resided in the palace during the greatest portion of the year, with his numerous and court-like retinue, his body of instrumental performers, and his operatic singers. Pohl describes the superb palace, the park, and the theatre; it is a fairy-like and strange world which lies displayed before us—and only a hundred years have passed away. The musicians and singers occupied a separate building, containing on the ground floor seventeen and on the first floor thirty-seven rooms. There were eleven married couples, each couple having two rooms; to Haydn, however, and his wife three were assigned. Every two members of the band had a room between them. There was a performance every day in the spacious and tastefully decorated theatre; it began at six o'clock. All the Prince's officials and servants were admitted to it, as were, also, any strangers who might happen to be in the place. Twice a week opera was played; on the other days, dramas and comedies were given. It was here that Haydn's earliest opera was first produced. The operatic company consisted of five or six men and as many women, mostly Italians; while the orchestra under Haydn's direction numbered from sixteen to two-and-twenty members. The performances were celebrated far and wide. "When I want to hear a good opera," said Maria Theresa, "I go to Esterhazy." It was after one of these operatic performances, followed by a masquerade, that Haydn was presented to the Empress, and seized the opportunity to remind her of the "recent spanking" which at her command he once, when a chorister, received in the gardens of the Schönbrunn Palace, because, despite reiterated admonitions to the contrary, he would clamber up the scaffolding. "You see, my dear Haydn," replied Maria Theresa in a kind and jocose tone, "the spanking has borne good fruit after all!" In addition to the theatre for operas and plays, the Prince had a separate Marionette Theatre, built like a grotto, and fantastically decorated with coloured stones, snails, and mussels. The scenery and machinery were described as surprisingly beautiful, as were, also, the artistically formed and richly attired puppets, all of respectable size. The parts were spoken and sung by members of the dramatic company behind the scenes. For this Marionette Theatre, which was in high favour with the Prince and his guests, Haydn wrote a number of short operas.‡

The drama was entrusted to the best strolling companies, who were engaged in turn for so many months, and played even great classical pieces. Among other such works for which Haydn composed musical interludes were Hamlet, King Lear, and Götz von Berlichingen.

The whole musical establishment at Esterhazy, according to Pohl's description, constituted, so to speak, one large family, the members of which clung faithfully together, and, by mutually cheering each other up, sought compensation for the complete absence of agreeable trips and other sources of amusement. Their life was probably at times rather free, and even Haydn was not proof against temptation. Through Pohl we learn for the first time something authentic concerning Haydn's love affair with the singer Luigia Polzelli. She was nineteen when, in 1779, she was admitted, with her husband, a violinist, into the Prince's musical establishment. Neither of them appears to have pleased the Prince; he wanted to discharge them even before the expiration of their two years' engagement; and it was evidently owing to Haydn's intervention that they were retained till the breaking up of the establishment (1790), notwithstanding that Polzelli, always ailing, could no longer fulfil his professional duties. Haydn had conceived a violent liking for the lady, though she, on her side, seems to have been actuated rather by greed than love. At any rate, she cost him a great deal. After the breaking-up of the Prince's musical establishment, Haydn procured engagements for her at small theatres in Italy. His love followed her to Placenza and Bologna; in fact, everywhere; so did—his money. He even contemplated, after his first journey to London, visiting Italy, for the purpose of seeing her. "I esteem and love you," he writes to her, "as much as I did the first day, and am always grieved when I am not in a position to do more for you. But have patience; a day may come when I shall be able to show you how much I love you." But that day did not come, not even when the twofold obstacle was removed by the death of Sig. Polzelli and that of Haydn's wife. Luigia Polzelli married, before Haydn's decease, the singer Franchi, in Bologna. It was not till 1832, that she died, aged eighty-two, in Kusohau. Haydn, whom people are accustomed to look on as a model of strict morality, had at least one excuse for this intrigue: his unfortunate marriage. As we know, he married, when in his nine-and-twentieth year, the eldest daughter of the Vienna wig-maker, Keller, or, rather, allowed himself out of good nature to be married by her, when her younger sister, whom he wanted, preferred entering a convent. Mdme Haydn was the greatest dissonance in the life of her eminently harmonious husband. Ill-natured, miserly, and bigoted, she embittered so consistently her husband's life that at last, after thirty years' wretchedness, he was compelled to send her into exile, in which she died (at Baden, near Vienna), in the year 1800. Though we live in an age of literary "rehabilitations," no one has yet had the courage to represent in a favourable light a woman whom the good-natured Haydn designated without more ado "una bestia infernale." Pohl cleverly puts in his mouth a quotation from Lessing's Junge Gelehrte: "It must be conceded that I have had no object save that of exercising myself in the virtues necessary for putting up with such a woman." The report once set afloat and utilized for a wide-spread system of begging, that Haydn was the father of young Polzelli, is convincingly refuted by Pohl.

† Joseph Haydn. By C. F. Pohl. 2nd Half-volume. Leipsic: Breitkopf and Härtel, 1882.

‡ It is really a pity that this droll entertainment has quite died out among us, and now possesses a retreat only in a few unimportant folk's theatres in Italy. Stendhal, who found Marionette theatres in good society at Naples in the last century, was quite charmed by them, especially by the clever extempore dialogue. He remarked that the persons talking, not having to trouble themselves about gestures and action, spoke far better than they would have done had they been on the stage, and he winds up by exclaiming: "Might not this class of play be transported to Paris? It is a source of the most lively amusement."

A much more agreeable impression than that made by this anything but ideal love affair with Luigia Polzelli, is the impression produced by the permanent and high-minded friendship which bound Haydn to Mad. von Genzinger in Vienna. This lady was the wife of the physician, Peter Leopold Genzinger, ennobled in 1789 by Maria Theresa for his eminent services. Fond of art, and especially very musical, Mad. von Genzinger was, when she formed Haydn's acquaintance, the mother of six children. Whenever Haydn came from Esterhazy to Vienna, he was a welcome visitor at the Genzingers' in the Schottenhof, made the daughter sing something, the mother play the piano, and himself took part as an executant in a quartet. His numerous letters to Mad. von Genzinger (first published by Karajan in 1861) are characterised by a rare mixture of respectful, nay, ceremonious politeness combined with warm and truly friendly devotion. In this family circle Haydn felt more happy than anywhere else. Only too quickly did the time glide past during his visits to Vienna; he was always compelled too soon to return to Esterhazy where he felt every year more lonely and more dissatisfied. "O, if I could but be a quarter of an hour with you," he writes to his friend, "to pour out my troubles and inhale comfort from your lips. I am subjected under the present system to many annoyances, which, however, I must here pass over in silence." "But in God's name," we read further on, "even this time will pass away and the hour arrive when I shall again have the inestimable delight of sitting near you at the piano, hearing you play Mozart's masterpieces, and kissing your hands for so many beautiful things."

MUSIC IN BERLIN.

(Correspondence.)

A quasi-novelty produced at the Royal Operahouse shortly before the close of the season was Gluck's comic opera, Der betrogene Kadi, "arranged" by J. N. Fuchs, who has supplied new words for the songs. The public, delighted with the music, were loud in their applause. The cast included Mdlles Driese, Pollack, Horina, Herren Fricke, Oberhauser, and Junck, who sang and acted with much spirit, and were called on at the fall of the curtain. The Kreuz-Zeitung has published the following details respecting the work:

"Favart, the manager of the strolling French company who accompanied Marshal Saxe to Flanders, as the leading heroes and heroines of the Paris stage subsequently followed the Emperor Napoleon to play before a 'pit of kings' at Erfurt—Favart, in his Memoirs, gives us an account of the origin of Gluck's comic operas. The artists of the Imperial French Theatre, Vienna, afterwards, like all other foreign theatrical establishments, done away with by Joseph II., used to perform, among other things, operettas in Court circles. The librettos were obtained through Favart from Paris and set to music by local composers. Favart himself, one of the most fertile French authors of comedies and librettos, furnished Gluck with several books and brought out some of his operettas in Paris. Lemonier was author of Le Cadi dupé, and the libretto appears to have agreed so well with the operetta-taste of the day that it stimulated not only Gluck but likewise P. A. Monsigny, author of a series of elegant operas, whose name, with those of Cherubini, Lesueur, and Martini, was proclaimed by heralds at a revolutionary festival held in 1798, in the Champ de Mars, Paris, as the name of one who had rendered good service to French art!—Anton Schmid, in his Biography of Gluck, says: 'This two-act piece with songs was translated by André from the French and under the title of Der betrogene Kadi performed very often at Berlin in 1783.' We may add that Carl Theophilus Döbbelin, who enjoyed a special patent from Frederick the Great, produced it at the theatre formerly known as Schuch's Komödienhaus in the Behrenstrasse on the 1st December, 1783. Five weeks previously, Döbbelin had introduced Gluck as an operatic composer to Berlin with the three-act musical piece, Die unvermuthete Zusammenkunft oder die Pilgrime von Mekka. This also was very successful at Döbbelin's Theatre. Otherwise, the manager, who had to depend entirely on his receipts, would not have followed it up so quickly with Der betrogene Kadi. Döbbelin discovered, moreover, in that year (the first Gluck-year at Berlin) that, as soon as the leaves appear in spring, the public disappear from the theatres. So he had a Summer Theatre erected in the garden known as Count Reuss's (where the Royal School of Medicine now stands). The spectators sat under an awning, green hedges formed the side-walls, and the easily constructed stage had the sky above, so that the curtain was not raised and let down, but drawn asunder to the right and left. The orchestra played under a large umbrella. But matters speedily went wrong with Döbbelin; the awning turned out not to be water-tight, and the Summer Theatre, the earliest in Berlin, was not successful. The more welcome, therefore, was a full treasury, in the 'winter season,' with Gluck's Pilgrime von Mekka and Betrogener Kadi."

Herr Ferdinand Gumbert has published in the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung his usual yearly statistical returns of the Royal Operahouse. From the 15th August, 1881, to the 5th June, 1882, when the season was brought to a close with Czar und Zimmermann, there were 255 operatic performances, the repertory consisting of 56 works by 28 different composers. These stand in order according to the number of times the respective works were given:—1. Wagner, 33 times with 6 works.—2. Bizet, 33, 1.—3. Meyerbeer, 29, 5.—4. Mozart, 25, 6.—5. Auber, 16, 5.—6. Gounod, 12, 2.—7. Weber, 11, 2.—8. Gluck, 11, 4.—9. Verdi, 9, 4.—10. Lortzing, 9, 1.—11. Grisar, 7, 1.—12. Beethoven, 6, 1.—13. Götz, 6, 1.—14. Marschner, 5, 2.—15. Nicolai, 5, 1.—16. Rossini, 5, 1.—17. Donizetti, 5, 2.—18. Rubinstein, 4, 1.—19. Franz Schubert, 3, 1.—20. Goldmark, 3, 1.—21. Boieldieu, 3, 1.—22. Ambroise Thomas, 3, 1.—23. Halévy, 3, 1.—24. Spohr, 2, 1.—25. Brüll, 2, 1.—26. Flotow, 2, 1.—27. Ueberlée, 2, 1.—28. Spontini, 1, 1. Artists who sang, not being members of the company (Gäste), were:—ladies, Luger (engaged), Lichtenegg, Pollack (engaged), Littner, Albani, Lola Beeth (engaged), Liszt, Wurzbach-Grossi, Klein, Kauer, Wassermann (engaged); gentlemen, Hedmont (engaged), Erl, Sylva, Marion, Hermann. The "novelties" during the season were Meyerbeer's Dinorah, Schubert's Alfonso und Estrella, and Gluck's Betrogener Kadi.

A new four-act opera, La Modella, has been produced at the Central Skating-Rink, the music by Oreste Bimboni, conductor of the Italian company. The story as told by Signori Fiorentino and Ducati, authors of the libretto, and based on a historical fact, may be thus summarised: Lippo Lippi, accompanied by his pupil, Folcoretto, visits a convent, for the purpose of painting an altar-piece. Both fall in love with a novice, Sister Lucrezia, selected as a model. Lippo runs off with her, but, denounced by Folcoretto, is arrested and cast into prison. Recovering his liberty, however, he challenges his rival. As they are fighting, Lucrezia rushes between them, and, receiving a dagger-thrust intended for Folcoretto, is killed, but, ere dying, reconciles the combatants. Bimboni has written some pleasing music, but full of reminiscences. The performers were Adini, Malvezzi, Aramburo, Brogi, and Caracciolo, who, with the composer, were several times called forward.

By virtue of an agreement between the Intendant-General and Johann Pafen, an invention for rendering objects fireproof is adopted in the Theatres Royal here as well as at Hanover, Cassel, and Wiesbaden, its efficacy having been proved. It is hoped that Pafen's mixture may have nothing in common with that employed at the Burgtheater, Vienna, the use of which will probably be discontinued. It appears that, in process of time, the salts and other chemical ingredients of which the mixture is compounded have a tendency to disintegrate and fill the air with minute particles, highly irritating to the throat. The consequence is that a voice, strong and fresh in the first act, grows languid and weary as the play goes on till at the end it verges on extinction. W. P. J.

Important alterations, designed principally with a view to the safety of the public, are being carried out at the National Theatre, Buenos Ayres.

BAYREUTH.—It was rumoured that, in consequence of an epidemic of small pox, the performances of the "Stage-consecrative-Festival-Play" (Bühnenweihfestspiel) announced for July and August would be postponed, but the rumour was destitute of truth. Herr Vogl, however, has written requesting Wagner to release him and Mdme Vogl from taking part in the said performances, wherein the husband was to represent Parsifal and his wife to appear as Kundry. The reason assigned for this is, that the Vogls are not to be exclusive representatives of the parts in question.

HANS RICHTER AT DARWIN'S.

It was at Whitsuntide last year that my friend, Hermann Francke, the manager of my concerts in London and the German Opera I am now conducting at Drury Lane, said that Darwin wished to make my acquaintance, and had invited me to spend the whole of Whit Sunday with him. Francke married Darwin's niece, formerly a Miss Wedgewood, and there was a good deal of music going on in Darwin's house. Mrs Darwin herself is extremely musical, and had neither more nor less than a classical musical education. How delighted I was at the invitation I need not say. Francke, his Wife, and myself started by an early fast train for Kent Down, which we reached in two hours. A carriage was in waiting and took us through a charming part of the country—the ground is undulating, and the verdure remarkable for its luxuriance, its English luxuriance—to Darwin's residence. This was an ordinary one-storied English country house, with nothing special or striking about it. There was the usual front garden planted with clumps of all kinds of shrubs and shady trees. The gates in the low railing were thrown open, and we drove up to the house. We were shown through a short passage direct to the parlour; the door was opened, and I stood before Darwin, who was seated in an arm-chair near the fire-place in which there was a small fire still burning. On our entrance, he rose quickly, holding out his hand and cordially greeting me. What was the first impression? Indescribable. I had seen many photographs and pictures of Darwin, but there is one thing which none of them, however good they may be, reproduced: the beauty of the eye, the Germanically-beautiful eye, with its endless benevolence, its wealth of goodness and gentleness. I was, I frankly confess, awfully agitated. I then gradually scanned him and found that all his pictures represented him with too dark an expression of countenance; his was a delicate face with a not immoderately large head, as people imagine. But, on the other hand, he was taller than one was apt to picture him, and when young must have been very tall, far taller than the usual height. The forehead was exceedingly large and magnificently developed; hair and beard completely white, the beard not so long and shaggy as in the pictures of him; in dress, the perfect gentleman. His whole appearance was exceptionally dignified and at the same time pleasing, as if he were some rich lord who had retired to his estate to live for his peculiar tastes—but, on looking the lord in the eye, you quickly perceived what streamed out of it. I could not look my fill, though expected at the same time to eat my fill, for breakfast was ready. Against the right wall of the parlour was a famous Erard, and before it a stand with an open music-book on it. It was Beethoven's 'Cello Sonata in A major. "Who here plays the 'cello?" I enquired. "No one," replied Darwin, "but my son, now in Strassburgh, plays the bassoon." Mrs Darwin, a stately, vigorous, handsome woman, far advanced in the sixties, and exceptionally ladylike, begged me to play something, she herself giving the themes, at first Mozart, then Haydn, Beethoven, and finally Wagner. I played pieces from the Meistersinger, Tristan, and Lohengrin. After dinner we went into the garden. During the dinner, which lasted about an hour and a half, Darwin was uncommonly amiable and lively. He laughed heartily whenever I told a funny story, but turned the conversation also to serious subjects, and emphatically dwelt on the deep respect he entertained for Germany, German intellect, and German work. He could not speak German, but he read and understood perfectly German scientific works, Mrs Darwin informed me. After dinner we had more music, for in the dining-room there was a magnificent grand; after the black coffee, we went into the garden, conducted thither by Darwin, who then retired to his study for his afternoon's nap. The study and the laboratory were two different rooms; the laboratory I did not see. The study was situated in the passage by which you enter the house; it lies on the right hand and the windows look on to the front garden. It was very simply fitted up and filled with bookcases, all in the neatest order. It was with exceeding great delight that Darwin showed me the large and magnificent album presented him on his seventieth birthday by some four hundred German savants, professors, &c. He repeatedly expressed his delight at it. What pictures decorated the room? Well, it is a remarkable fact, in this room as likewise in the passage, there were none but pictures from the history of Christ's Passion, both the whole journey to the Cross and other scenes out of the New Testament, though only such as relate to Christ, as the Sermon on the Mount, the Draught of Fishes—I think in water-colours. I observed no busts. While Darwin was having his nap, we walked about the garden. Before the dining-room there was an open verandah from which, without having to descend any steps, you pass directly into the garden. First of all there was a large lawn for the English game with balls.* Then came beds covered with clay pots, glass hand frames and so on, as well as a large glass house. Were the flesh-eating plants cultivated in it? I do not know; I saw a number of flowers of the strangest description, but I am not strong in botany. The garden led to a wild or English park, as it is usually called. We opened the latch of a gate in the paling, the mechanism having been previously explained to us, and stood in the midst of a wood, with luxuriant meadows on the slope before us, all of the most magnificent green and the most reviving freshness. On our return, we met Darwin in the dining-room, and at his request I played something more. Then we again had a solid meal to strengthen us for the return journey. Darwin complained of being obliged to interrupt his work in the laboratory; the doctors, he stated, would not leave him alone; they said he must go to the seaside, and he was quite inconsolable that he might not work there. On our taking leave, he promised that this year, in June, when Die Meistersinger was performed, he would come up to London on purpose. Which of us would have thought, when this promise was made, that one so vigorous and cheerful was never destined to redeem it!—Neuer Wiener Tagesblatt.

CHESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(To the Editor of the "Daily Telegraph.")

SIR,—While thanking you for your friendly notices of our Musical Festival, I must ask you to print these few lines, written to avert a misconception which might easily arise, and which would be very injurious to this cathedral. Your reporter says that one singer was "particularly well received," that two others gained "great applause," that in another case the audience "warmly testified their approbation," and that in another "the marked approbation of the large audience was secured." It is evident that these expressions might naturally be understood to denote audible and even loud expressions of feeling. But nothing of the kind occurred during any part of our services at the Festival, and if such irreverence had been conceived of as possible, these services would never have been held in the cathedral at all.—Your obedient servant, J. S. HOWSON.

It would really not be uninstructive for the history of our civilization to follow carefully these wonderful works of conversion, since they have led to the formation, in the domain of music, a domain hitherto so gloriously occupied by Germans, of a strangely ramified party, composed of the most different elements, and the members of which appear to have simply assured themselves mutually of impotence and unproductivity.

You will now, my dear Madam, first ask how it happened that the indisputable success which I achieved, and the friends whom, after all, my works openly procured me, could not in any way be employed to combat these hostile machinations?

This cannot be easily or shortly answered. First of all hear what happened to Franz Liszt, my best friend, and most zealous champion. It was precisely through the magnanimous self-confidence which he exhibited in every matter that he provided his opponents, who were cautiously on the watch, and took advantage of the most trivial and subordinate things, with the very weapons which they wanted. What the latter so ardently desired, namely: the elimination of the question about Judaism, a question which so irritated them, was agreeable to Liszt, also, but, of course, for a directly contrary reason, namely: because he wished to see an honourable dispute on art free from embittered personal feeling, while it was the interest of his opponents to keep concealed the motive of a dishonourable conflict, the cause of the calumnies directed against us. Thus, then, this fermenting element in the movement was left untouched by us as well as by the opposite party. On the other hand, it was a jocular notion of Liszt's to accept the nickname of "Musicians of the Future," which had been applied to us in ridicule, in the same way that the name of "gueux" was accepted by the Netherlanders. Genial traits like these, on the part of my friend, were extremely acceptable to his opponents; the latter had now, on this point, scarcely any necessity for further calumny, and through the "Musicians of the Future," it was a very easy task to attack an artist like him, so impetuous both in his life and in his productions. With the defection of a hitherto warmly devoted friend, a great violin-virtuoso, on whom the shield of Medusa appears at last to have taken effect, there commenced against Franz Liszt, a man, in every respect, magnanimously careless, that raging agitation, which finally brought about the disappointment of his hopes and the spirit of bitterness, owing to which he abandoned for ever his splendid efforts to found in Weimar an abode where music might be supported and promoted.

Now, my dear Madam, are you not as much surprised at the persecution to which our great friend was subjected, as at that which overtook me?—You might, perhaps, be deceived by the fact that, owing to the brilliancy of his outward artistic career, Liszt had certainly drawn down upon himself the envy of different people, especially of his German colleagues, who had stuck by the way, and that, moreover, by his abandonment of the career of a virtuoso, and by his appearance for which, up to that time, he had been simply preparing, of a creative artist, he excited, in a tolerably intelligible manner, a doubt that very easily arose, and, therefore was easily to be fostered by envy, as to his fitness for the fresh vocation he had chosen. I think, however, that I shall be in a position to prove, by means of something on which I shall subsequently touch, that, if we search to the very bottom of the matter, we shall find that these doubts, precisely as, in my case, my supposed theories, were used simply as an excuse for a war of persecution; just as with the latter, it was sufficient to examine attentively the former, and weigh them against the correct impression of our productivity, to perceive that the question rested upon an entirely different point; we might then form an opinion, discuss the matter, and speak for or against it; something would, at any rate, have come of such a course. But this was exactly what was not desired; nay, this careful examination of the new phenomena was just what our opponents wished to prevent; on the contrary, with a vulgarity of expression and of insinuation, the like of which has never been known under similar circumstances, they so howled and roared in the wide domain of the press that it was entirely out of the question to come to a human verbal explanation. And, therefore, I assure you, that what Liszt also underwent, springs from the effect produced by the article on "Judaism in Music."

But this did not strike even us at first. There are, at all times, so many interests determining people to oppose new phenomena, nay, to brand unconditionally, as heretical, everything contained in them, that even we could not help supposing that we had to do, in this case, simply with slothfulness and the love of ease, which we had disturbed, felt by those who look upon art as a mere business. Since it was, above all in the press, and, moreover, in the large and leading political papers, that the hostile attacks appeared, those friends who were rendered anxious about the result of Liszt's appearance, which now took place, as an instrumental composer, by the fact that the impartiality of the public was disturbed by these attacks, considered that they ought to adopt active measures; with the exception, however, of a few mistakes which were committed, it was speedily evident that the most deliberate discussion of one of Liszt's compositions could find no admittance in the larger papers, the entire space in which was already taken up and occupied by a hostile interest. Who now will seriously believe that such a course on the part of the great papers indicated apprehension of the harm which might be inflicted by a new direction in art upon good old German taste for the latter? I have lived to find that, in an esteemed paper of this description, it was impossible for me to mention Offenbach in a manner appropriate in his case; who can, in this instance, believe in anxiety about German taste in art? To such a pitch did matters go; we were entirely excluded from the great German papers. But to whom do these papers belong? Our liberals and men of progress have to pay dearly for being tarred by their opponents, the old conservative party, with the same brush as Judaism and its specific interests; when the Romish ultras enquire what right a press directed by the Jews can possess to take part in matters connected with the Christian Church, there is a fatal meaning in their question, a meaning at any rate based upon a correct knowledge of the dependent position of the papers in question.

The strange thing in all this is that the fact is known to everyone; for who has not learnt it from his own experience? I cannot say how far this indisputable state of things extends to higher political affairs, though the Exchange affords a pretty evident indication; but in the domain of music, a domain abandoned to the most utterly worthless babble, sharp-sighted persons do not entertain the slightest doubt that everything is subjected to a most remarkable rule, which is carried out in such widely-ramified circles, and with such unanimous exactitude, as to lead us to believe in highly energetic organization and management. In Paris I found, to my surprise, that this most careful management was no secret; everyone there can relate the most wonderful traits in connection with it, especially with regard to the care, descending to the very smallest details, taken in order that the secret, which by being shared by too many persons concerned in it was exposed to become ventilated, might, at any rate, be protected from open denunciation, that every little hole, however small, through which it could find its way into a paper should be stopped up, even were this done by a visiting card dropped in the keyhole of a garret. Everyone, then, obeyed as in the best disciplined army during an engagement; you know the platoon firing which was directed against me in the Parisian press, and demanded by good taste in art.—In London, I met in this respect, with greater openness. Mr. ——, the musical critic of the Times (just reflect how colossal and universal is the paper of which I am speaking), assailed me immediately I arrived with a storm of insults, and did not hesitate in the course of his outpourings against me, to hold me up to public indignation as the calumniator of the greatest composers, on account of their Judaism. With the English public, he had more to gain than to lose in importance by this discovery, on the one hand, in consequence of the great consideration enjoyed among the English by Mendelssohn, and, on the other, perhaps, in consequence of the peculiar character of the English religion, which strikes competent judges as being based more upon the Old than upon the New Testament.—In St Petersburgh and Moscow only did I find the ground of the musical press as yet neglected by Judaism; I there experienced the wonderful fact of being taken up, for the first time, by the musical press in exactly the same way as by the public, whose kindly feelings for me the Jews had not been able to affect anywhere except in my native town, Leipsic, where the public have simply stayed away from me altogether.

In consequence of the laughable aspects of the matter, I have almost fallen into a jocular tone in this communication, but I must now give up that tone, if I would undertake, my dear Madame, in conclusion, to direct your attention to a very serious aspect of the matter, which aspect, probably, commences, even for you, exactly at the point where we turn from the persecution of me, to consider the effect of this remarkable persecution as far as it extends to our artistic spirit itself.

RUBINSTEIN'S PARADISE LOST.

There are some who hold that Anton Rubinstein is fitted by nature to be a composer of the little. They point to his charming songs and smaller pianoforte pieces with a triumphant air, contrasting the universal favour in which these are held with the anything but unanimous verdict passed upon his more pretentious effusions. Let this be as it may, one thing is certain—Rubinstein has an intellectual preference for the vast, the grandiose, and the sensational. He has written a symphony, The Ocean, to which he is continually adding new movements, as though it should, even in dimensions, be worthy of an illimitable theme. In opera he has dealt with the heroic story of the Maccabees, and in oratorio with the wonders of Babel and the "confusion of tongues." More than this, it is to Rubinstein we owe a musical illustration of the events which, as says Milton, "brought death into the world, and all our woe." We can conceive an oratorio on the subject of Paradise Lost which shall be in the manner of an idyll. The fresh joy of Nature in her youngest hours, the innocence and beauty of man's first life, the temptation, the fall, and the banishment from Edenic delights to a place of labour and sorrow, made endurable by a promise of ultimate restoration—these things need not be treated in the Ercles' vein. They form a "pastoral" through which runs a moral of profound significance and of always absolving interest to those upon whom the mysteries of life weigh heavily. But Rubinstein—or Rubinstein's poet influencing him—could not be satisfied with the simple story of Paradise. Within the limited space of an oratorio he has compressed the argument of him who invoked the muse's aid to an > "Adventurous song,

> That with no middle flight intends to soar
> Things unattempted yet in prose or rhyme."

We cannot conceive a greater mistake. That the Paradise Lost of Milton should go back to the origin of things, show us the revolt in Heaven, the creation of the world and of man, and the conspiracy of the lost angels against the happiness of the new creature, is right enough. Milton's poem is an epic, and the whole ground of his subject had to be covered with epic fulness. But when a composer emulates this comprehensiveness he invites disaster. Either he must make his work of enormous and unmanageable length, or he must lay himself open to a charge of sketchiness and inadequacy of treatment. Rubinstein's oratorio proves the fact, by trying to avoid each fault and being successful in escaping neither. On the one hand, it is too long; on the other, some of the tremendous events dealt with are scarcely more than touched. The plan of the work, in short, is too big altogether—so obviously too big that we can only explain Rubinstein's non-perception of the fact by supposing him under the influence of an overwhelming fancy for sensationalism. There is reason to believe that this influence actually controlled him, and we find it in the poem, which deals largely with the powers that waged war on Heaven. The rebel angels are brought on the scene as often as possible, and nothing is done to qualify their position or their sentiments. They fight against the celestial legions with such words as "Curses light upon God's Throne," and, in torment, they exclaim to their leader, "Give us vengeance on yon Heaven, and on God." Elsewhere Satan is made to call up Sin and Death, with their attendant train, who answer "out of Hell's recesses deepest," and profess themselves filled "with Hell's intensest ardour." All this is decidedly strong, and proportionately attractive to a tumultuous composer like Rubinstein. But the temptation should have been resisted. Such scenes are beyond art, and better left to the imagination. Even Milton, for all his prayer—

> "What in me is dark, > Illumine; what is low, raise and support"—

did not keep up "to the height of this great argument," and that which his genius failed to do with the full and rich resources of language is certainly impossible to the more restricted means of the painter and musician. In Paradise Lost, however, Rubinstein gives the loosest rein to his daring. He consented to the introduction of even the Divine Being, and allotted to Him, hardly veiled by the designation, "A Voice," the most conspicuous part in the work. Can we wonder that the music to the scenes in Heaven, notwithstanding its unquestionable power and still more undisputable noise, seems weak and unsatisfactory? Who is sufficient for these things? That there are exceptions to the rule of inadequacy we admit. The invocation of Death and Sin, for example, contains striking and impressive passages, while the angelic chorus following the Divine announcement of a purpose to create a new race is excellent in character and treatment. But, generally speaking, we see in this part of the work a composer of grandiose proclivities struggling with a subject which, if treated with no more than grandioseness, is almost burlesqued. We see him, too, getting the worst of the encounter.

In the second part, Rubinstein's poet, still elevated on the highest of stilts, sets forth the story of the Creation, and requires the composer to measure himself against Haydn. The old master does not count for much in these days, it is true, being spoken of by "superior persons," when they condescend to notice him at all, with a mixture of pity and contempt. Rubinstein, doubtless, is too wise to decry the composer of The Creation, and must have had uncomfortable reflections as to the result of the comparison here challenged. We will not say that his reflections were entirely unwarranted, for even the orchestral representation of Chaos—a subject well adapted to the ability and taste of so many modern composers—cannot match that of Father Haydn. Moreover, all the stages of the six days' work are treated with a brevity which, though unavoidable, leaves behind a feeling of incompleteness. On the other hand, it cannot be denied that the music contains many happy ideas effectively expressed. The chorus of angels, who hail the rising of the firmament, is a case in point, short though it be. So is that attendant upon the birth of fruits and flowers, and that which describes the calm shining of the new-made moon. In point of fact, wherever the subject invites what we may call lyrical treatment, Rubinstein does not fail to display the gentler graces that constitute his real strength. At the end of this part, the composer gathers himself up for a mighty effort, even as did Haydn when the heavens first declared the glory of God. The chorus, "Ring out, ye heavenly trumpets," is one of his finest achievements in the grand style. Introduced by a pompous exordium for voices and instruments, it takes the form of a fugue on the words "Praise ye the Mighty One." Soon, however, the voices forsake the contrapuntal subject to combine in massive harmony, while the theme remains with the orchestra and constitutes the chief feature of accompaniment. The peroration is a genuine climax, and the number, as a whole, would deserve a very high place were it not lacking in individuality, and, we may add, scored so as to make the effect degenerate sometimes into that of mere noise.

The third part is that which justifies the title of the work, by devoting its action to the incidents of "man's first disobedience." Here, however, the librettist has thought proper once again to introduce the rebel angels, who open with a chorus of triumph, using words thus rendered by a severely literal translation, "Hell, keep glowing, hotter, hotter! Satan, sputter fiercer flamings! For 'tis Hell that conquers now." This may appear a gratuitous horror; but, on the other hand, the poet, deficient in the Gothic spirit that led Wagner to write music for a dragon, has passed over the actual temptation, and escaped the serpent. The fatal sin is supposed to have been committed, and we are concerned chiefly with its punishment, after devils have triumphed, angels mourned, and Raphael, Michael, and Gabriel pleaded in an exculpatory trio that hell was too strong for their guardianship of the new-made creatures. The scene in the Garden between the Divine Judge and our first parents is given with considerable minuteness. Then we have the lament of the offending pair, with which are conjoined the exultation of hell and the grief of heaven, the whole work coming to an end with the shutting of the gates of Eden. Musically speaking, the third part is the weakest in the oratorio. The ear and mind have already had enough of Rubinstein's demoniacal music, and of shouting contests between devil and angels; nevertheless both are repeated here ad nauseam, unrelieved by graceful episodes such as those that have already engaged our attention. Without going further into details, we may say that this is characteristic in a modified sense of the entire work. Paradise Lost is too strongly suggestive of effort. Save for here and there a quiet episode, it is full of storm and stress—laborious striving after effects not always attained, and a piling of Pelion on Ossa in vain attempts to reach the inaccessible. An over accumulation of means has its usual results. The orchestra sometimes becomes vulgar with excess of noise, while the voices, unsparingly used in an unvocal manner, soon fall painfully upon the ear. This is the fault, not of Rubinstein's musicianship, but of his temerity in choosing a subject beyond his power, as, indeed, it would be beyond the power of most men. At the same time, we must fairly recognize a partial success.

Though the performance was far from perfect, we may speak of the solo singing in terms of general praise. Mdme Rose Hersee gave apt expression to the music of an angel in the first part, and of Eve in the second and third. She brought intelligence to her task, and the inestimable quality served her well. A word may be said, also, for the manner in which Misses Penna, Farnol, and Hudson respectively impersonated the archangels, Raphael, Michael, and Gabriel. Signor Foli gave characteristic effect to the music of Satan, and Mr Ludwig was excellent in the part of Adam. The greatest credit of the evening was due, however, to Mr Barton M'Guckin, whose delivery of the many recitatives allotted to "A Voice," bespoke him alike a good vocalist and an intelligent artist. We take full cognizance of the difficulties which both orchestra and chorus had to encounter; yet it must be said that a better rendering of the concerted music should have been forthcoming. There only remains to add that the oratorio was received without much enthusiasm, and that the English version of the text had been well written and skilfully adapted to the music by Mr Henry Hersee. Mr W. G. Cusins was the conductor.—D. T.

CONCERTS.

Crystal Palace.—The twenty-sixth series of Saturday afternoon concerts was completed last week, leaving only the usual supplementary "benefit" of Mr Manns, the conductor, announced for to-day. Saturday's concert included the first performance in England of a new symphony by Signor Sgambati, a Roman composer and pianist, of whom we recently spoke with unqualified favour in reference to his brilliant performance of a concerto of his own at the fifth concert of the Philharmonic Society. Signor Sgambati's symphony is an elaborate composition, consisting of four principal divisions, of which the first and the last are the most diffuse and the least interesting. In the symphony generally, and especially in the portions just specified, the influence of Wagner and Liszt is very manifest in the avoidance of coherent structure and continuity of interest, together with a tendency to exaggerated and spasmodic orchestral effects. The second movement, andante maestoso, contains much flowing and melodious writing, with fanciful and well varied instrumentation; the scherzo is spirited, vigorous and well contrasted with the two associated trios. The symphony, conducted by the composer himself, was greatly applauded throughout. It is unnecessary again to eulogise Signor Sgambati's great executive powers as a pianist, which were on this occasion manifested by his performance of Beethoven's great Concerto in E flat. Mdlle Badia sang with much success Verdi's scena "Ah! fors' e lui" and the air of Salome from Massenet's Herodiade; while Mr B. M'Guckin gave Handel's recitative and air, "Deeper and deeper still" and "Waft her, angels" in very artistic style. The programme also included the barcarolle from Balfe's Painter of Antwerp (assigned to the singer last named), Mendelssohn's overture to Son and Stranger, and that to Schumann's Genoveva. With the exception of the symphony, Mr Manns conducted as usual. The selection for his "benefit," this afternoon, includes Beethoven's Choral Symphony. After the concert the presentation of the Manns testimonial will take place in the Opera Theatre, and after the presentation a complimentary dinner to the universally esteemed conductor, who has helped to make the Crystal Palace a temple to the Muses.

Richter Concerts.—Beethoven's great Mass in D was performed at the seventh concert of the present series, given in St James's Hall, on Monday evening. The extraordinary work, so illustrative of its composer's highest genius and of a daring which, in its latest development, practically amounted to weakness, is no longer "caviare" to our public. This was shown by a large attendance, and by the lively interest with which every movement was followed. Even the most recondite utterances of Beethoven are now beginning to be understood, or, at any rate, are heard with a conviction that they can and ought to be understood. The agreeable fact, however, does not make their interpretation any the more easy, as Herr Richter and his people had reason to know on Monday night. Indeed, a perfect rendering of the Mass remains, and will remain, something to dream about, but hardly to realize. The highest praise possible under such conditions was deserved by the latest on the present occasion, band and chorus working together with as much skill as energy, and, led by their masterly conductor, overcoming every difficulty not quite insurmountable. Some of the solo parts were in excellent hands, notably that for the soprano, allotted to Mdme Peschka-Leutner, who, a few years ago, came amongst us for the first time and won universal admiration. We shall have immediate occasion to speak of this lady in connection with German opera, and it may suffice now to say that she sang Beethoven's music as perfectly as fastidiousness itself could desire. Miss Orridge was an excellent contralto, never at fault, and Mr Shakespeare distinguished himself as usual by an admirable combination of the qualities that make up a musician and a vocalist. It is impossible to say as much of Herr Elmblad, who seemed to be managed by his voice than his voice by him. Herr Richter, it is scarcely requisite to add, conducted in splendid style, and was loudly applauded.

Philharmonic Society.—The Philharmonic Society concluded a successful season—the 70th since its foundation—at St. James's Hall last week with the first performance in this country of Paradise Lost, an oratorio or sacred drama by Rubinstein. The fame of Rubinstein as a pianist is so great and so well-founded, and some of his songs and pianoforte pieces are so charming, that an important work from his pen always deserves respectful attention. It would, however, be difficult to assume a more admiring attitude of mind towards what, in plain language, must be called a very weak and tedious production. To begin with the libretto, it is such that one must wonder how a composer of Rubinstein's intelligence could have selected it. Its sacred and mystic subject is treated "free after Milton," according to a statement on the title-page of the score in the worst German doggerel, which it must have given Mr Hersee much trouble to turn into intelligible English. The first part is concerned with the rebellion of Lucifer and his followers, and their defeat by the angels. The battle itself is depicted in a double chorus of grand dimensions, the most elaborate number of the score worked out with considerable skill and power. The solo parts in this portion are represented by "A Voice"—the symbol of the creative Deity—Satan, and an angel. There is little or no attempt at dramatic characterization, the utterance of the "Voice" being very commonplace and especially inappropriate under the circumstances. Satan vents his rage in a lengthy scena, and the only sympathetic personage is the angel, who sings an air which, although a distinct imitation of the Mendelssohn pattern, brings welcome relief among these dreary surroundings. It was sung with charming simplicity by Mdme Rose Hersee, whose sympathetic voice also told admirably in the music assigned to Eve in the third part of the oratorio. The ten numbers of the second part comprise the successive acts of creation, the utterances of "A Voice" being in each case responded to by a brief chorus of angels describing and applauding the wonders of the world. With the exception of the last number, which contains a scholarly fugue, there is little in these short choruses to interest the musician or to appeal to the human sympathy of an unsophisticated audience. The feature of the sacred story most apt to evoke much sympathy, curiously enough, has found no place in Herr Rubinstein's sacred drama, which may well be compared to the famous performance of Hamlet without the Prince of Denmark; for "The Temptation and the Fall," instead of being made the chief event of the story, is assigned to a short and uninteresting orchestral interlude, without the slightest reference to the incident it purports to illustrate. A more unsuccessful attempt at "programme music" it would be difficult to discover in the whole range of modern art. In the last act the wailings and rejoicings of angels and demons begin again with renewed vigour, another elaborate double chorus bringing the oratorio to a welcome close. The reasons for producing such a work as this it would not be easy to discover. It does not represent its composer's mature style, and its performance has not, as far as we can learn, been anywhere accompanied by success. Its rendering by chorus and orchestra had evidently been prepared by Mr Cusins with a care which might have been bestowed with more advantage upon a worthier task. Among the chief soloists Mdme Rose Hersee has already been mentioned. Mr Barton M'Guckin declaimed the lengthy speeches of "A Voice" with due emphasis, and Signor Foli's strongly pronounced manner was well suited to the part of "Satan." This artist has had many opportunities of realizing the various operatic embodiments of the evil principle, and should be as familiar with the musical language of fiends and demons as Blake and the Swedenborgians with their every-day speech.—Times.

Miss Saidie Singleton gave a concert on Friday evening June 9, at the residence of Dr and Mrs Julius Pollock, Harley Street, before a numerous and fashionable company. Besides taking part in duets by Gounod and O. G. Thomas, Miss Singleton gave agreeable renderings of "Voi che sapete" (Mozart) and "My Heart" (Moncrieff). Madame Clara Samuel, in "The old and young Marie" (Cowen); Mr Hutchinson, in "The Secret" (Goetz); Mr Ben Davies, in "My Queen" (Blumenthal); Mr Maybrick, in "Maid of Athens" (Gounod); and Madame Enriquez, in a charming new song, "When the house is still" (Blumenthal), all ministered to the gratification of the audience, to which Messrs Robertson and Thorndike equally contributed. Though the vocal music exceeded in quantity the instrumental, the latter were in quality not less worthy and acceptable. Herr Louis Ries played solos by Hofmann and Rameau in the capital style usual with this well-known violinist. Miss Randegger was held in special favour. The young pianist, now rising into fame, gave a highly artistic rendering of Chopin's Scherzo in B minor. More than equal to every demand made upon mere executive skill, she proved herself a congenial exponent of the composer's thoughts. The governing melody was each time "sung" with true accent and expression, indicating that Miss Randegger is on the way to become an accomplished mistress of her art. In Liszt's "Tarentella" her brightness and vivacity found ample scope. The conductors were Messrs Sidney Naylor, Cliffe, and Randegger.—P. G.

Mr Kuhe's Concert.—This annual concert is announced to take place in St James's Hall on Monday next, and promises excellent entertainment. The programme contains, as usual, a large number of selections adapted to please all tastes, while the artists engaged comprise Mesdames Albani, Sembrich, Marie Roze, Trebelli, Pauline Lucca, Mary Davies, and Sterling; the Misses Robertson; Messrs De Reszké, Massart, Foote, Santley, Musin (violin), Hollman (violoncello), and Kuhe (pianoforte). These names, needing "no bush," will secure for the bénéficiaire a crowded house.

Franz Rummel gave a "Pianoforte Recital" on Friday afternoon, June 9, at St James's Hall. The performance of Mr Rummel a few seasons ago, at the Crystal Palace, and notices of his artistic tour in the United States, have been recorded at various times in The Musical World. Since his return from America, Mr Rummel has resided at Berlin, where he is highly esteemed. At the "recital" on Friday afternoon, June 9, he exhibited his command over the instrument of his predilection in playing by memory, and with remarkable ability, the following compositions, of widely different characters:—

1.—Chromatische Fantasie und Fuge (Bach); Sonata, F minor, Op. 57 (Beethoven). 2.—Andantino and Variations (Schubert—Tausig); Sonata, G minor, Op. 22 (Schumann); Rondo Capriccioso (Mendelssohn). 3.—Nocturne, Op. 27, No. 2, Polonaise, Op. 53, and Berceuse, Op. 58 (Chopin); Concert Etude (Brassin); Etude, Op. 2, No. 6 (Henselt); Scherzo, "Aus der Serenade," Op. 35 (Jadassohn); Barcarolle, and Valse—le Bal—(Rubinstein); Serenata, Op. 15, No. 2 (Moszkowski); Waldesrauschen—Etude—and Rhapsodie Hongroise, No. 2 (Liszt).

The audience were attentive and appreciative throughout.

Kensington Orchestral and Choral Society.—Another of the concerts of this society was given at the New Town Hall on the 8th inst. The attendance, as upon former occasions, was large and fashionable, and Mr William Buels, to whom the Kensingtonians are indebted for these agreeable meetings, again won compliment and credit for the excellence of his programme. A performance of Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen" occupied the first section of the proceedings, the solos and choruses of which were efficiently sung by Miss Agnes Wood, Miss B. K. Martin, Mr Walter Joy, and Mr F. B. Davis and choir, while the duties devolving upon Mr Buels' amateur orchestra were just as carefully and skilfully discharged. Altogether, this charming pastoral has seldom, under similar local circumstances, been represented so completely and with so much pleasant intelligence. The second part of the concert was devoted to a varied miscellany of vocal pieces and instrumental solos. Among the former Mr E. F. Buels shone conspicuously by his delivery of Handel's "Ruddier than the cherry," in which he disclosed, as we have before had occasion to report, a flexibility of execution not ordinarily the characteristic of barytone voices. Miss Marion Burke, in Watson's pathetic ditty, "A winter story," and Mr J. A. Rooney, in Piatti's daintily conceived song, "Awake, awake!" were also listened to with pleasure, the latter deriving no little of its interest from the violoncello obbligato of Mr William Buels, whose suavity of tone and purity of expression almost recalled the playing of Piatti himself. Miss Marion Buels, another member of this highly accomplished family, challenged something more than honourable mention by her brilliant rendering of Liszt's Rigoletto solo, in which every exhibitory test is afforded for those facilities of hand which the fashion of the day has made indispensable. There was likewise a violin performance which did honour to the player, M. Szczepanowski. The concert took place under illustrious patronage, and Mr Buels is fairly entitled to congratulate himself, and be congratulated, upon its success.—H.

Mr W. G. Cusins, the conductor of the Philharmonic Society, gave an interesting and well-attended concert at St James's Hall, on Wednesday afternoon. The most important item of the programme was a trio in C minor, for pianoforte and strings, composed by Mr. Cusins himself, and admirably rendered by him in conjunction with Messrs Straus and E. Howell. It is a work of serious purpose, written regardless of immediate success, and revealing throughout the hand of an experienced and accomplished musician. Among the four movements, the first, allegro and larghetto, are, perhaps, the most successful. Besides Beethoven's sonata, in D (Op. 102, No. 2), for pianoforte and violoncello, and a brilliant valse by Mr Cusins, the programme comprised an interesting selection of vocal music, including settings of Tennyson's poems by various composers, and a duet by Steffani, the famous Italian composer of the 17th century. Mdmes Rose Hersee, Carlotta Elliot, and Patey, Messrs Maas, Santley, and F. King were the vocalists.

PROVINCIAL.

Leeds.—Special interest attached to Saturday evening's Town Hall Organ Recital from the fact that the programme had been arranged so as to form a tribute to the memory of the late General Garibaldi. One of the most successful pieces, and certainly the most appropriate, was a composition set by Dr. Spark to Garibaldi's National Song, which the deceased General sang at the head of his followers on the 18th August, 1860, on board the English transport steamer Amazon, which was conveying them from Palermo to Messina. Dr. Spark's composition was first introduced at the Leeds Town Hall on the 27th October in the same year, and became very popular at the time. The music is highly effective, and its rendering on Saturday evening gained for the composer and performer an enthusiastic round of applause, an encore being demanded. Dr. Spark never gave the recitative and air from Elijah, "O rest in the Lord," with better effect. As the Dead March in Saul was being played the audience rose to their feet and listened with the deepest attention. The final piece was described as "National and patriotic anthems," comprising "Rule Britannia," "Italian National Air," "The Marseillaise," and "God Save the Queen," in which last the audience joined heartily. It was decided to repeat the performance on the Tuesday and Saturday following.

BETRAYING OR REVEALING.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

Sir,—Does a work of merit "betray," or "reveal" an experienced hand? Yours obediently, Simon Half.

[Half and half, my simple Simon.—Dr Blitge.]

Annette Essipoff-Leschetizky—that veritable pearl among pianists—has returned to Vienna, where she means to take a holiday this summer. May it be a pleasant one.

Despite his own asseverations, in order to avoid further importunate enquiries, it is said that Verdi has nearly completed his Otello. (For Otello read Iago—and then take the statement as simply a figurative myth.—Dr Blitge.)

The Pianoforte Recitals of Mr Charles Hallé have materially enhanced the attractions of the Grosvenor Gallery, Music and Painting being now "sister-arts" in the fullest acceptation of the phrase.

A preface explanatory of the story and plan of Wagner's "music-drama," Tristan und Isolde, to be produced at Drury Lane on Tuesday night, under the direction of Herr Richter, has been written by Mr C. A. Barry, and printed for private circulation. Those who intend witnessing the performance will do well to obtain a copy.

Tristan und Isolde, regarded by uncompromising Wagnerians (cumini sectores) as Wagner's absolute masterpiece, is to be produced at Drury Lane Theatre, under Herr Richter, who has unsaddled Seidl, just as our own Tristram (or Tramtrist) unsaddled Sagramore and Dodinas, for scoffing at the knights-errant of Cornwall. If the Prime Minister as well as the Prince of Wales does not attend the performance, it will be a grievous misadventure.

French Musical Festival.—We may draw attention to this novel festival, which begins, in the Royal Albert Hall, next Tuesday, with a "grand inaugural ceremony," over which the Lord Mayor will preside. On this occasion the National Anthems of England and France will be sung by 2,000 members of the French Orphéon societies. Tuesday evening and Wednesday afternoon are devoted to concerts, supported by some of the leading artists of the Paris Opéra and Conservatoire, and the prizes won in the competition will be distributed on the evening of the second day. London amateurs are expected largely to embrace the opportunity to learn how music stands amongst their French neighbours.

EURYANTHE AT DRURY LANE.

Weber's Euryanthe was produced on Tuesday night before an audience, not crowded, but interested and applausive. Fifty-nine years, less a few months, have passed since the opera was first performed, under its composer's own direction, he taking with him to Vienna, where the event happened, a favourite pupil who, as Sir Julius Benedict, witnessed the representation of which we have now to speak. Sir Julius can, doubtless, recall that memorable incident of his youth, and also the sympathy which must have possessed him with what Weber, writing to his wife, styled the "glorious success of Euryanthe." He may remember, too, an ominous apparition in the shape of "an old woman, with bangled hat and draggling shawl, who insisted upon pushing forward from bench to bench, shrieking out, amid the Homeric laughter of the whole house, 'Make room, make room for me, I say. I tell you I am the poetess, the poetess.'" That old woman was the evil genius of Weber's new venture, just as she was of Schubert in connection with Rosamunde. Vain and eccentric, with just enough literary ability to secure a position where she could make herself ridiculous, Helmina von Chezy lost no chance of connecting her name with those of great men. Hence, when Weber, who had read some of the Chezy fictions, applied to her for a libretto she eagerly caught at the chance of an artistic alliance with the famous author of Der Freyschütz, and put before him, amongst other things, a sketch from a French romance, "Histoire de Gérard de Nevers et de la belle et vertueuse Euryanthe, sa mie." A subject less fitted for operatic treatment could hardly have been discovered; but composers rarely know what is good for them in such matters, and Weber adopted it straightway. The "confounded old Chezy," as he called her, soon gave him cause to recognize and repent an error. Her first scenario was absolutely impossible, and might, with its apparatus of bloody daggers, roaring lions—in France of all places—moonlit castles, and gloomy vaults have come from the brain of a demented Mrs Radcliffe. Then Weber tried his hand; he and the "old lady" having many a sharp encounter over the changes proposed. That the master improved upon Helmina may be imagined; but to him is traceable the absurd spectral figure which, though invisible to the audience, comes into the story, apparently to give occasion for supernatural music. Composer as well as poetess is, therefore, answerable for a libretto more weak and absurd, perhaps, than any that opera can show. Euryanthe was doomed from the first, not to death, since it is living still, but to an existence which the power and beauty of its music have never redeemed from ridicule.

The action of the play opens in a Royal castle, where king, knights, and ladies are celebrating victory and the peace it has conquered. Among the knights is one Adolar, who grieves for the absence of his beloved Euryanthe. This the King learns, and graciously observes, "I will send for her; she shall be queen of the revels. Meanwhile give us a song in her praise." Adolar at once "obliges," and when he has finished, another knight, Lysiart, cruelly remarks that he likes the song, but finds the sentiment ridiculous, because no woman's word was ever worth a thought. Adolar at once offers to defend his faith with his sword, but Lysiart tenders a bet on the result of another sort of trial. His proposal is accepted, the two knights wagering their estates—one that Lysiart can, the other that he cannot, seduce the affections of Euryanthe from Adolar to himself. The resemblance here to the main incident upon which Shakspere's "Cymbeline" turns must be obvious. We are next shown the entrance of "Emma's vault" in the castle of Nevers, and witness a scene between Euryanthe and a certain Eglantine, who, as soon appears, uses the cloak of love for her friend to disguise a sinister purpose. Euryanthe spends much time in "Emma's vault," and Eglantine—naturally, we must confess—desires to know why. The maiden, in a burst of confidence, answers. Poor Emma was a sister of Adolar, and loved one Eldo, who, falling in battle, left the maiden so disconsolate that she sucked an "envenomed ring," and departed this life, hoping to join her lord elsewhere. But the suicide could not enter heaven, and now "a secret sorrow bears she in the vault below." If it be asked how Euryanthe knew all this, the reply is that Emma's ghost appeared, disclosed the particulars above given, and added that heaven would open to her when the ring had been "bath'd in tears of injured innocence." We do not exactly know why, but Eglantine on learning this exclaims "The welcome secret!" and Euryanthe reproaches herself with having broken her plighted word to Adolar. When left alone Eglantine allows her drift to be seen. She loves Adolar, hates Euryanthe, and hopes to win the knight's affection by means of the "secret" in "Emma's vault." Then messengers, headed by Lysiart, arrive with the King's invitation to Euryanthe, who is delighted to join Adolar, and the act ends—for her, happily; for us, confusedly. The second act opens upon the same scene. Lysiart is despairing of success, and, in a long monologue, expresses his feelings with emphasis. While he is thus engaged Englantine emerges from "Emma's vault" with the "ring of awful fate," which she has stolen in order to prove Euryanthe faithless to her plight. Her words of rejoicing are overheard by Lysiart, and, as the pair are rowing in the same boat, it suddenly occurs to them that they cannot do better than marry, and make a joint-stock concern of that vengeance which they vow by "gloomy night" to enjoy. We return now to the Royal castle, there witnessing the happy meeting of Adolar and Euryanthe. All goes well till Lysiart appears and coolly claims that he has won the bet, tendering in proof Emma's fatal ring, of the existence of which none but Adolar and Euryanthe knew. The maiden denies the gift, but in vain. Lysiart is at once endowed with the title and lands of Adolar, who, full of rage and stern of purpose, orders Euryanthe to accompany him to her doom. Where the now miserable pair go appears when the curtain next rises upon a gloomy forest, and shows us the knight prepared to kill the woman whom he believes faithless. Happily a monstrous serpent is seen advancing, and Euryanthe implores Adolar to let her be its victim, so that he may escape. The knight rushes off, is supposed to despatch the scaly assailant, and comes back, touched by Euryanthe's devotion. He will not kill her. He will simply go away and leave her. When he does so she lies down and sings herself to sleep. Now enter the King and a party of hunters, who recognize the waking maiden and try to cheer her up by such common-places as "Hope on; live on." Euryanthe, however, swoons in her misery, and is carried off by the hunters. Here the Drury Lane version closes the third act, opening a fourth at Nevers Castle, just as the nuptials of its new lord and Eglantine are about to be celebrated. Adolar is outside the gates, and mingles with the discontented retainers and peasantry as the wedding procession comes forth. Justice is also there, in the form of Emma's ghost, which Eglantine sees pointing at her with threatening finger. Confusion follows. Adolar rejoices in the intervention of heaven, and Lysiart bids his people seize the "base serpent of the dust." As no one obeys, the two knights are about fighting when the King appears to judge the case. Eglantine now confesses all, and is stabbed by the enraged Lysiart, whom the King at once sentences to death. Meanwhile Euryanthe has revived, and there being no reason why all should not end happily, that desirable consummation is promptly brought about. Comment upon so ridiculous a story would be superfluous, but it may be well to mention that the chorus occupies throughout not only a prominent, but a peculiar position. It does not display the moralizing spirit of the Greek chorus; but it always penetrates the true motives and purposes of the various characters. Whoever may be deceived, the chorus sees clearly, and preserves the audience in the right way, even when wickedness seems to flourish like a green bay tree. This, of course, serves to intensify the excessive stupidity or silliness of the principal personages, as they allow themselves to be entangled in a plot of more than childish absurdity.

Coming to the music, we have not to treat the greater part as though it were a new or unknown thing. The beautiful overture ranks among the most familiar of orchestral selections, while the romance, "Unter blüh'n-den Mandelbäumen," the cavatina, "Glöcklein im Thale," the duet for Euryanthe and Eglantine, the aria, "Wehen mir Lüfte Ruh," and the hunting chorus have long been favourites in our concert-rooms, to say nothing of the fact that sometimes entire scenes are given from the platform. As is the music known to the English public, so—Tuesday's performance proved it—is that with which they are not yet intimate. Intense dramatic feeling and refined lyric sentiment run through the opera. We may wonder at the presence of these qualities in connection with such a story, and we may marvel that Weber first accepted, and then had the patience to work upon such a tissue of follies. But this does not alter the fact that his genius shines from every page, almost blinding us to the imbecility of the "poetess." Much might be said with reference to the musical structure of the opera, especially as it appears in the happy blending of lyrical pieces with dramatic scenes. Weber, reformer though he was, did not see his way to abolish the aria, duet, and chorus. He held, with other great masters, that these have a legitimate place in lyric drama, but, while acting on this belief, he expanded the dramatic episodes till they rivalled the lyrics in point of importance and interest. Euryanthe affords an example of the procedure, as it does of that use of representative themes and freedom of orchestral treatment which have since been so dangerously exaggerated. Yet Weber's orchestration strikes us now as "thin," and his dramatic music as simple almost to weakness. This, however, is only a result of unconscious contrast with the more modern method of noise and bombast. If we look at Weber's music with a single eye for art, we shall see its purity and truth. It expresses all there is to express, and does so while using no more means than the subject requires. By this sign may genuine art always be known. It is the sham which lets loose a flood in order to float a leaf. We therefore commend Euryanthe to English amateurs, as an example of what operatic music ought to be, and of what it may be, without exaggerating or neglecting any essential principle.

The performance was not, generally speaking, one of the best of the season. It lacked the finish with which the Wagnerian operas were produced, and even presented several cases of downright negligence, both on the stage and in the orchestra. On the other hand, it had excellent features, notably the Euryanthe of Frau Sucher, who again charmed by her grace of bearing, sympathetic manner, and able singing. In the more passionate scenes Frau Sucher was tempted to force her voice unduly. This, however, was the only blemish upon an effort of high distinction and well-nigh complete success. Frau Sucher, could not, of course, do much, from a dramatic point of view, with the silly character she played; but those who could not regard Euryanthe with patience, watched the artist admiringly. Frau Peschka-Leutner (Eglantine), who was hardly in good voice, gave intense expression to her part, the great dramatic talent she admittedly possesses being displayed with striking power in the various crises of the story. Herr Nachbaur proved to be, both as vocalist and actor, a somewhat weak Adolar; but Herr Gura's skill received one more demonstration in the part of Lysiart. His performance throughout the final scene was very masterly. Of the minor characters, sustained by Herr Landau and Fräulein Wiedermann, it is needless to speak, while it may be superfluous to praise the singing of the chorus. The opera had a sympathetic reception, loud applause and much curtain-raising following each act.—D. T.

SCHUMANN'S FAUST.

The directors of the Symphony Concerts did a good deed by performing the whole of Schumann's Scenes from Faust. Some of these had been heard previously, and the epilogue to the Second Part of Goethe's drama is familiar in its musical dress. But from a presentation of the entire work concert-givers have, till now, shrunk; influenced, perhaps, by the exceeding difficulty of many parts, and by fear lest a public insufficiently acquainted with the poem should miss the point of illustrations not, in themselves, easy hearing. The force of these deterrents is undoubtedly great. Schumann refused to study the convenience of executive artists. If they could not interpret his ideas, so much the worse for them and for him also; but in any case the claims of the work were paramount, and the rest took their chance. We see the fact well illustrated in the Faust music, which demands, alike from voices and instruments, more strenuous labour than the average singer or player cares to bestow. A scarcely less important consideration for concert-givers arises from the disjointed character of the libretto, and its large dealing with a section of the original read by few and understood by fewer. The scenes illustrated, though their order is that of Goethe's poem, are often so wide apart as to demand for their connection a comprehensive knowledge of the story. This drawback, however, may not have been in Schumann's purpose, since it does not appear that he at first intended to publish the work in its present form. As a matter of fact, he never published it at all; the various scenes being collected and given to the world after his death. He probably wrote the music more for his own gratification than with any ulterior and practical object, picking up the task at intervals extending over years, and dipping into Goethe so far at random that the order of the various episodes is by no means that of their composition. According to the master's biographer, Wasielewski, he produced first that which is now the third part of the entire work—in 1844—just before leaving Leipsic for Dresden. This year was not one of Schumann's happiest. Although in poor health, he laboured so hard at the Faust epilogue as to bring on alarming symptoms, premonitory of the disease which, twelve years later, took away his life. He may have connected the work with the suffering in a superstitious sense; but, at any rate, the epilogue was not resumed till 1847, when the final chorus rounded it off. In 1849—a period of remarkable fertility with Schumann—the master turned his attention to the first part of Faust, writing, between July 13 and 26, the cathedral and garden scenes, and that for Ariel and the Doctor. In the April following he added the episode of the Grey Women and Faust's death, subsequently writing an orchestral introduction, and so completing the work as it stands. When a thing grows by fits and starts like this we have no right to expect much coherence, at the same time the want of coherence is a disadvantage made all the greater by the nature of the incidents and the character of the text. Taking the whole into consideration, Mr Charles Hallé, and the directors of the Symphony Concerts, deserve the credit due to boldness of action. They essayed a hard task, and one which, however successfully accomplished, ran some risk of failure.

Schumann's music to the scenes of the first part of Faust cannot be heard without comparison with that of other composers. It is, however, contrast rather than comparison to which we are invited, because Schumann naturally looked at the subject from another standpoint than the one occupied by Gounod, Berlioz, and Boïto. They were chiefly concerned with objective ends, whereas it was in Schumann's disposition to be always subjective. Hence his music, in this case, is not adapted to rival theirs in popularity. It does not bring before the mind's eye events and personages coloured by its art, so much as ideas and moods. In short, these scenes are more reflections and feelings than pictures, and it is unfair to reproach them with dramatic sketchiness, since drama was not in the composer's thoughts. Looking at the music rightly, its power becomes evident and its charm is felt. What seemed at first weakness—the absence of vivid characterization and descriptiveness—appears as strength. We recognize a profounder application of art than mere picturing, the musician helping us not to look at but into the beings whom the poet has created. Illustrations of this fact are easily adduced. There is one in Gretchen's prayer to the Mater Dolorosa, and another in the Cathedral scene, throughout which the "Dies iræ" of the congregation, with its terrible notes of death and judgment, is more conspicuous than are the exclamations of Gretchen or the taunts of Mephistopheles. In the second part Schumann finds himself among supernatural creatures, and here, for lack of mental phenomena within the range of his comprehension and feeling, he becomes picturesque. Another note is struck in the spirit choruses, with their vivid description of twilight, night, and daybreak. But when Faust speaks the music returns to its profoundly contemplative vein, passing therefrom into a weird fantastic mood as it enters upon the strange episode of the Grey Women—an episode treated with remarkable power of imagination. All this is interesting, especially to connoisseurs who look with an eye for that which is deeper than mere technicality. Still, the third part, so full of lyric charm, and of concerted music as beautiful in some places as, in others, its hardihood is uncompromising, will always command a far greater measure of admiration. Its frequent severance from the rest of the work can be understood at a glance, and there is danger lest it tempt us to overlook the actual merit of the parts preceding. This danger can best be averted by giving the scenes in their entirety, as on Thursday evening, when it appeared that though the order of beauty differed, beauty itself was never wanting. Of the performance we can speak, generally, in terms of praise. The orchestra, being Mr Hallé's, was expected to know its duty thoroughly and to discharge it well, nor did the result disappoint anyone; while the chorus may have surprised many by the efficiency displayed in connection with a work so trying. Mr Otto Peiniger and his amateurs should be congratulated upon a most creditable success. Mrs Hutchinson sang the music of Gretchen with equal taste and feeling. These, indeed, were the distinguishing qualities of her performance, and how far they go to atone for technical defects no connoisseur needs telling. The defects in Mrs Hutchinson's case were slight and completely overshadowed by her merits. Mr Shakespeare, as Ariel, and in the third part, as Pater Ecstaticus, brought his invariable refinement and expression to the work; good service being also done by Mr Sauvage (Pater Seraphicus) and Miss Larkcom (Care). Though not in his best voice, Mr Santley sang the music of Faust—who is here a baritone—splendidly. A finer rendering of the great scena in Part II. could not have been desired. It is impossible to say as much concerning the delivery, by Herr Emblad, of the music of Mephistopheles. Herr Elmblad has a huge bass voice of the roughest description, which he either does not know how to manage or cannot control. This gentleman is fortunate in being a German, since an English applicant with no better qualifications for the post would assuredly have been sent back to his studies. Mr Hallé conducted with rare tact and skill, and deserved all the applause he received. Previous to Faust Mendelssohn's overture, Meeresstille, and Beethoven's fourth pianoforte concerto were performed, the soloists in the last-named being the conductor of the evening, who resigned his bâton into the capable hands of Mr E. Hecht.—D. T.

STUTTGART. — Mdme Schröder-Hanfstangl having obtained an audience from the King of Wurtemberg, prevailed on his Majesty to re-consider his decision, and, despite his flattering assertion that "such talent as hers cannot be spared," to let her go to Frankfort, where she will receive 25,000 marks annually, instead of 18,000, as at Stuttgart. Either Mdme Basta from Munich, or Mdme L'Allemand from Frankfort, will succeed her at the Theatre Royal in this city.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

Gounod's Faust on Saturday night, with Mdme Pauline Lucca as Margherita, drew a very large audience, many of whom knew only by report what a powerful rendering of the character she could give, a decade having passed away since she illustrated on the London stage the woes of the hapless maiden. Fortunately, time has not dimmed the brightness of her genius, for, as an actress, she now, as before, holds high rank. It is not uncommon for one to close the eyelids, when some vocalists are exercising their gifts, in order to enjoy the melody undisturbed; but Mdme Lucca commands attentive watching. The gaiety of the "Jewel Song" would be dulled were one to depend upon the mere vocal display. In the exquisite music of the garden scene, from the first awakening of affection until reaching perilous delirium, each phrase was delivered with finished, yet, apparently, spontaneous art. With unerring skill each look and gesture found corresponding expression in the voice. Later on, however, when Margherita from the casement of her dwelling pours forth in rapturous accents the full burthen of her love, the voice scarcely proved a trustworthy ally of the dramatic conception. In the church scene, however, Mdme Lucca was in every respect admirable. Her voice has that peculiar timbre which imparts intensity to the expression of sorrow and terror, tones and feelings becoming related in the most direct manner. From this point her success was triumphant. The other leading parts—Siebel, Mephistopheles, Valentine, and Faust—were represented by Mdlle Stahl, M. Gailhard, M. Devries, and Signor Frapolli.

However difficult may be the task of unravelling the plot, it is generally conceded that the music with which Meyerbeer has enriched his Dinorah might have saved weaker plots from insignificance. The very character of the libretto robs much of the music of its proper effect, but none can gainsay that a wonderful wealth of imagination is pictured forth in the score, and something approaching to a surfeit of melody. The difficulty, of course, is to find an adequate exponent of the heroine—a part with which few prime donne, even of the most accomplished, can cope successfully. This disappears when Mdme Patti is at hand, for then the creation of the poet as well as of the musician is beheld in its ideal form. A crowded house assembled to witness her once more in the familiar garb of Dinorah, and to listen to the music as she alone of living artists can render it. It is true that Mdme Patti's voice has not altogether stood proof against the strain of a lengthy and exacting career; but the difference is so slight as to be almost imperceptible, the quality remaining unchanged, and her facility of execution being as much a marvel as ever. Old successes were repeated, the distinguished artist creating a marked impression in the opening scene, with the beautiful "lullaby," and arousing the house to enthusiasm in the "Shadow Song"—encored, as a matter of course. A more genuine triumph has not been witnessed. Why Mr Gye, having a really good Corentino in Signor Frapolli already in his company, should have selected Signor Marini to fill the part is hardly intelligible to the outside world; and why M. Dufriche should have been substituted for Signor Cotogni as Hoel without explanation is equally a mystery. Under the circumstances, M. Dufriche, who is to play the Count in the Nozze di Figaro on Saturday, is exempt from criticism. Mdlle Tremelli made a very successful appearance as the Caprajo, and was loudly applauded after her song, "Fanciulle che il core." Other parts were in sufficiently competent hands.

The first performance this season of Don Giovanni was so similar to that of past occasions that slight reference to it may suffice. As before, the character of Zerlina was raised into primary importance by the exquisite vocalization and charming acting of Mdme Adelina Patti, which were as admirable as ever. The "Batti, batti," and "Vedrai carino," produced the usual marked effect and enthusiastic encores, as did the duet "La ci darem" for Don Giovanni and Zerlina. The cast was generally excellent, comprising, as last year, Mdme Fursch-Madi (Donna Anna), Mdme Valleria (Elvira), Signor Cotogni (Don Giovanni), Signor Marini (Don Ottavio), M. Gailhard (Leporello), and Signor Scolara (Masetto).

On Thursday we had I Puritani, with Bellini's flowing melodies, and Mdme Albani as an Elvira peerless since Giulia Grisi. The opera announced for last night was Semiramide, with Mdme Patti as Semiramide, Mdlle Tremelli as Arsace, and M. Gailhard as Assur. Here again is melody in abundance. For to-night we are promised Le Nozze di Figaro, more melody, the really "infinite melos," which goes on for ever

"In profuse strains of unpremeditated art."

Oh! for melodists; we want them sadly, all at present being "stale, flat, and unprofitable." Even Mr Shaver Silver cannot leave a new opera humming a tune with refreshened lungs! Sad, indeed, such a state of things. The Prophète is announced for Tuesday, with Mdlle Stahl as Fides, and M. Sylva (who must transpose considerably) as John of Leyden; Fra Diavolo (melody for ever!), after two or three postponements, is to be given on Thursday, with Pauline Lucca as Zerlina; and Velleda, an opera by M. Lenepveu, Mdme Patti's especial choice, "very shortly." Boito's Mefistofele will, after all, be presented, with Marguerite Helen Emma Albani in lieu of Marguerite Helen Christine Nilsson, about whose controversy with Mr Gye there is nothing to say that would not be "impertinently curious."

Gialdina Gialdino Gialdini succeeds Pedrotti as conductor at the Teatro Regio, Turin.—(This will break Pedrotti's heart, seeing that G. G. G. is an adequate conductor. Why does not Mr Gye give us some Ponchielli?—Dr Blidge.)

The Teatro de la Vittoria, Montevideo, has, according to one American journal, been converted into a mad house, according to another, into a war-horse, according to another, into a warehouse; although Naudin has been singing at the Teatro Minerva, Udine. (There must be some misapprehension here.—Dr Blidge.)

The announcement in several papers that the barytone, Santa Athos, is secured for next season at the San Carlo, Naples, would seem to be a premature hoax.—Santa Athos was, not long since, a star of the eleventh magnitude at Covent Garden.—Moreover, Adina, Aramburo, and Gasperini are engaged for Italian opera in Prague.—Dr Blidge.

Mdlle Victoria de Bunsen, the esteemed young Swedish vocalist, has announced a matinée musicale, under the immediate patronage of the Princess of Wales, for Monday next, at 27, Harley Street. Mdlle Victoria de Bunsen, who has just recovered from a long and serious illness, will be assisted by her sister, Mdlle Felicia de Bunsen, and many other talented artists, but, we regret to learn, she is not well enough to undertake an active part in the entertainment of her friends.

Royal College of Music.—At a meeting of the Common Council, Mr W. J. Scott, chairman of the Music Committee, said there were now 1,300 students at the Guildhall School of Music, which was the largest institution of its kind in the world. Each student on an average paid £10, and the whole of the fees were rateably divided among the eighty professors and teachers. The expenses, borne by the Corporation, were about £3,000 a year; and the premises were held at a nominal rent. The Coal, Corn, and Finance Committee brought up a report to consider how the court could appropriately aid in the movement set on foot by the Prince of Wales for establishing a Royal College of Music, giving systematic musical instruction to all classes of Her Majesty's subjects. A contribution of £5,000 in aid of the Royal College of Music, to be paid in five annual instalments of £1,000, was suggested and unanimously approved.

"Miss Albrecht is not only a pianist of remarkable power and ability but a composer of very elegant music for her 'instrument de prédilection.' This spirited 'Martial Fantasia,' in G major, boldly asserts its title, and is indeed a stirring effusion, that might be made effective, in score, for a military band. The piece is no child's play, but will require study. The staccato octave passages alone supply work for fire-eating players."—"Musical Standard," May, 1882.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

TRISTAN UND ISOLDE AT DRURY LANE.

June 21.

Reserving criticism upon an extraordinary example of misapplied genius, if not of cynical indifference to all that the world holds worthy in the art of music, we may now state that Wagner's Tristan und Isolde—ripest fruit from a "tree of good and evil," especially evil—was produced last night for the first time in England. A large audience, among whom Germans were a majority, witnessed the representation, which was marked by the care and completeness shown in every Wagnerian performance, though denied to that of Weber's Euryanthe. Herr Hans Richter, thinking no pains too great, had brought his orchestra very near perfection, so that nothing was lost by incompleteness in the one agent upon which Wagner relies for musical effect. It is true that the instruments might often have played what was not set down for them without much harm to the general result, and few would have known it. Still, if this sort of thing is to be treated seriously, we do right to feel grateful for such pains as were taken by the admirable Drury Lane conductor and his right worthy followers. Concerning the chorus there is not much to say, as they had very little to sing. A few bars here and there in the first act are all Wagner allows, and the chief significance of these lies in the fact that they exemplify the composer's idea of a nautical strain. The two principal characters were represented, for the first time, it is said, by Frau Sucher (Isolde) and Herr Winkelmann (Tristan), both of whom added another and a striking success to their English list. The task was terribly hard, almost superhuman, and it is no wonder that at times even their trained power of physical endurance seemed to fail. But they somehow lasted to the end; sustaining throughout a clear and vigorous conception of character, and investing their respective parts with all the interest possible to high intelligence. Fräulein Marianne Brandt, who made her first appearance for the season, achieved an equal success as Brangäne. Her voice may not be now so fresh as it was, but her skill and intelligence as an actress has increased with time, and down to the smallest dramatic detail her embodiment of Isolde's attendant was a study. Herr Gura (King Mark), Dr Kraus (Kurwenal), and Herr Wolff (Melot), completed a cast in all respects adequate to the work. The usual demonstrations attended each fall of the curtain, even Tristan und Isolde finding admirers—a fact which goes to prove that nothing need be friendless in this world.

Schluss.

Those who witnessed the performance of Tristan und Isolde at Drury Lane Theatre on Tuesday evening then learned what Richard Wagner is at his best, and, we should hope, at his worst—at his best in the sense that this music-drama exemplifies the master's theory pushed to utmost limits; at his worst, in that, consequently, it stands farthest removed from everything recognized by the world as artistically beautiful and true. Seventh in order of Wagner's operas, and coming after much of Der Ring des Nibelungen, Tristan und Isolde is accepted among its composer's disciples as the most complete embodiment of the gospel in which they believe. To preach Tristan und Isolde is to advocate the purest Wagnerism that has ever flowed from a source addicted to sending forth an article constantly varying and frequently mixed. We are asked to take it in without question, for Wagnerism is, it seems, a religion. At any rate, the author of a recently published expository and admonitory pamphlet enjoins us to approach Tristan und Isolde, not with a critical, but a real intelligence, prepared to accept it "with some degree of faith." For ourselves, we shall do nothing of the kind, choosing to imitate a certain people of old who, when a new religion was offered them, searched the sacred books of their ancient creed to see "if these things were so."

In Tristan Wagner draws upon a Celtic myth, taking one episode in the life of a famous knight whose career was as full of adventure as of violence and wrong. Sir Walter Scott speaks of "the extreme ingratitude and profligacy" of the hero whose doings are celebrated in Sir Tristrem; but with the mythical champion's general history and the conflicting versions of it we need concern ourselves at present no more than with the question whether the particular incidents adopted by Wagner had or had not their origin in natural phenomena. Let us take the story as it stands, rejoicing to find that it concerns men and women, not gods, giants, and dwarfs, that it contains no zoological curiosities, and that its representation lasts only one night. The plot can be the better understood for some acquaintance with incidents occurring prior to the opening of its action. There was once a King of Cornwall named Mark, who paid tribute to King Anguish of Ireland—or, rather, should have paid, but did not. To Mark, therefore, came messengers from Anguish demanding the money. The Cornishman refused to settle, but offered to commit the whole matter to the ordeal of a single combat. At this King Anguish was "wondrous wroth." However, he sent his brother-in-law, Sir Marhaus (the Morold of Wagner) to do battle. Now Marhaus was a great warrior, and abode in his ship off Tintagil many days, while the Cornish king was vainly seeking a champion. At last the state of affairs reached the ears of King Mark's young nephew Tristram, son of King Meliodas of Liones. Hastening to Cornwall Tristram offered himself, was knighted, and encountered Sir Marhaus on an island. They "hurtled together like rams" for more than half a day. "By then," says Sir Thomas Malory in his Mort d'Arthur "Sir Tristram waxed more fresher than Sir Marhaus, and better winded and bigger, and with a mighty stroke he smote Sir Marhaus upon the helm such a buffet that it went through his helm, and through the coif of steel, and through the brain-pan, and the sword stuck so fast in the helm and in the brain-pan that Sir Tristram pulled thrice at his sword or ever he might pull it from his head; and there Marhaus fell down on his knees, the edge of Sir Tristram's sword left in his brain-pan." After this, Sir Marhaus ran away to his ship, sailed home, and died. Tristram, on his part, suffered much from a poisoned wound received in the fight, and at last went to Ireland, under the name of Tramtris, to be cured in the country whence the venom came. There he was put in the care of La Beale Isoud (Isolde), the king's daughter, who not only healed him but learned to love him. Unhappily it fell out one day that the queen, with a woman's curiosity, examined Tristram's sword, and saw that a piece of the edge had been broken off. A terrible discovery followed. The fragment taken from Sir Marhaus's head completed the weapon, whose owner must have slain the Irish champion. The Queen, thereupon would have killed Tristram as he lay in his bath, but was held off, and the knight went back to Cornwall safe and sound. At home he so vaunted the beauty and worth of La Beale Isoud as to make his widower uncle, King Mark, desire her for wife, and no long time elapsed before Tristram was again at the Irish Court, demanding the maiden's hand for his Royal relative. "Wed her yourself," said King Anguish. "Then I should be ashamed for ever as false to my promise," replied the knight, "give her to me for King Mark, mine uncle." The Irish monarch's answer was singularly accommodating. "As for that, ye shall have her with you, to do with her what it please you: that is for to say if that ye list to wed her yourself that is to me levest; and if ye will give her unto King Mark, your uncle, that is in your choice." So Sir Tristram, or Tristan as we must henceforth call him, took the sea with La Beale Isoud, or Isolde, and as their ship nears the coast of Cornwall Wagner's drama opens. Most of the incidents above narrated are referred to in the dialogue of Tristan und Isolde, but with some changes. It is the maiden, for example, who discovers in the soi-disant Tramtris the slayer of her uncle Morold, and it is she who lifts the sword in revenge, but lets it falls harmless as the knight looks into her eyes from his sick couch.

The first act opens on the deck of the ship as a sailor at the mast-head sings of his distant Irish love. The song grates on Isolde's ears. Tristan, as in honour and by custom bound, holds aloof from her, while she tries to lure him to her side. In a passion, she wishes the ship and all on board may go to the bottom, and hints at some dark and desperate deed. Talking to her attendant, Brangäne, the maiden, woman-like, works herself more and more to a pitch of fury. "Go and command him to attend me." Brangäne goes, but the knight is wary and proffers various excuses, backed up by his faithful henchman, Kurwenel, who, moreover, vaunts Tristan's victory over Morold, the sailors joining in chorus. Imagine Isolde's rage when overhearing all this. To Brangäne she tells the story of Morold and the discovery of his slayer; dwelling upon that which intensifies her passion, and at last exclaiming, in unlady-like language, "Curse him, the villain! Vengeance! Death! Death for me, too." Her purpose is here revealed, and she knows how to carry it out. Her mother had added to the marriage trousseau a casket of "subtle magic potions," including a death-drink for emergencies, and a love-drink to be "exhibited" to King Mark on the wedding day. She will share the death-drink with Tristan. Brangäne prays her to relent, but the fatal impulse is strengthened by news that the Cornish coast lies ahead. "Prepare the 'true cup of peace,' and say to Tristan that I will not land till he has asked me to forgive and forget." To this message the knight responds, but Brangäne slily pours the love-potion, not the poison, into the cup. After a long dialogue, reproachful on the part of the lady, deprecatory on the part of the gentleman, who more than suspects what is intended, but seems careless of life, Tristan drinks, and Isolde takes what is left. Both expect to die, but instead thereof they stand looking at each other with eyes in which, according to Wagner's directions, "the expression of defiance to death fades and melts into the glow of passion." The drink works on, and soon the pair are in each other's arms, screaming at the top of their voices, according to the Wagnerian law in such a case made and provided. At this moment the land is reached; the crew prepare to receive King Mark; Isolde's attendants clothe her in the Royal mantle, and the curtain falls. The dramatic art of this act cannot be denied, and need not be pointed out; but the scenes, regarded as scenes for music, are terribly prolonged, and exhausting alike to the means of the performers and the attention of the audience. Wagner, however, has erased the word "expediency" from the vocabulary of the lyric stage. He is above even the laws of nature. Let his laws prevail, though the heavens fall. The incident of the love-drink chiefly offers itself for discussion here, and has been characteristically defended by Wagner's champions, who are always prepared with some transcendental plea for the acts of their master. Admitting the story as a fit subject for opera, no defence is, in this case, required. The love-potion could not be taken out of the plot; at the same time we decline to approve it because in mediæval times it "to some extent resembled, if, indeed, it was not the natural outcome, of the irresistible fate which pervaded the ancient Greek drama;" or because the cup does not actually bring about Tristan and Isolde's love, only doing so metaphorically, "by leading to the discovery that they have been foiled in their determination to end their woes by poison." Reasons like these are not less beside the mark than superfluous. The objection is not to a love potion, which frequently plays a part in opera, but to the undisguised sensualism that follows it. To call the passion which animates Tristan and Isolde "love" is to drag a beautiful name through the dirt. Real love expresses itself neither in the language nor the demeanour of this couple, whose feeling is simply excited animalism. In the interest of all that is pure and good let us call such things by their right name.

At the time of King Mark, men hunted in Cornwall by night, and when the second act opens they are trying the monarch's home coverts, with noise of horns enough to scare every bird and beast for miles round. Isolde, now a wife and a queen, stands watching the hunters and thinking of Tristan, who, it seems, is in the habit of visiting her on signal made by extinguishing a torch that burns at the door. The chase having gone afar she would put out the torch at once, but Brangäne, with a feeling of coming woe, remonstrates and delays the act. Not for long, however. Though Brangäne bids her ware a certain Sir Melot, Tristan's enemy, who suspects and watches, the queen goes heedlessly on, avowing: "The signal! And were it my spirit's spark, smiling I'd destroy it, and hail the dark." The torch extinguished, Tristan comes, as Romeo to Juliet, but with no such right, and once more the school of artistic carnality rejoices in a masterpiece after its own highest wish. Although in an open garden, the pair exclaim their loudest in such interjectional observations as "Endless pleasure! Boundless treasure! Unconceivéd! Unbelieved!" Then they call the day dishonest, because it keeps a nephew from his uncle's wife, and laud the night which brings them near. This preliminary over, "Tristan draws Isolde gently aside, to a flowery bank, sinks on his knee before her, and rests his head on her arm." So they talk again about the night, and glorify darkness, afterwards "sinking into oblivious ecstacy, reposing on the flowery bank close together." Brangäne, still fearful, tries to rouse them, but they resemble Solomon's sluggard in unwillingness to get up, and are still embracing and invoking night when King Mark, Melot and the hunters discover them. Melot is triumphant; Tristan petrified; Isolde, to her credit be it said ashamed; and Mark pathetically avuncular. Forgetting that he is a dishonoured husband, he sees only a peccant nephew to be tearfully reproached. Tristan waits till Mark has had his say, and then invites Isolde to follow him into a land where the night they love so well always reigns. She will go with him anywhere, and the declaration is received with a kiss. Melot at once starts forward, sword in hand. Tristan, too, draws; but, dropping his guard, receives the point of his opponent's weapon, and falls into the arms of Kurwenal. The curtain falls likewise. The one thing in this act is the so-called love scene. We admit the beauty of Wagner's language, but, even apart from the considerations regarded so philosophically by King Mark, is it well to have the more sensual side of a powerful human relationship fully and deliberately exposed on the stage? We think not. Gounod goes far enough when Faust and Marguerite are under the influence of the enchanted flowers, but this is a quick passion over which, save for devilish intervention, virtuous instincts would have triumphed. Wagner, on the other hand, offers what may be called a "demonstration," according to the scientific use of the word. We cannot enlarge upon the subject for obvious reasons, but we may and must protest against a stage exhibition which can have only one meaning and lead to only one train of thought; the meaning and the thought being alike condemnable. The matter would not be so important but for the fact that this sort of thing is almost an essential of the "new art." What sort of "new art" can that be the supporting pillars of which are crime and lust?

When the curtain rises for the third time, we see the exterior of Tristan's castle in Brittany, and its wounded master lying unconscious upon a couch, attended by the ever-faithful Kurwenal, who expects the coming of Isolde to heal the knight, as once before she did. A shepherd keeps watch for her vessel from the cliff, and as he pipes, Tristan awakes, to learn how he had been conveyed to his own place, and to call upon Isolde, of whose coming he hears with transport. The time of suspense is prolonged, but at last a joyous strain from the shepherd signals the approach of the ship, while Kurwenal from a watch tower feeds the growing excitement of the knight by describing her movements and appearance. Isolde lands, and on hearing this Tristan can contain himself no longer. Exclaiming, "All wounded and bleeding Sir Morold I defeated; all bleeding and wounded Isolde now shall be greeted," he tears the bandage from his hurt, showing the blood-stains on his body, and staggers forward as the expected one enters. Falling at her feet, and murmuring her name, he dies, while Isolde, after a pathetic monologue, falls senseless beside him. Another ship is now signalled, and Kurwenal bars the castle gate. Soon, however, King Mark and his people force an entrance; Kurwenal opposes them, and falls dead beside his master. Then Mark tearfully maunders over the body of his nephew, and Isolde, recovering from her swoon, sings the death-song of her lover and herself. As she expires, King Mark consistently bestows his blessing on the corpses, and the drama ends. Against this third act it is difficult to raise more objection than that the tearing away of the bandage, so exposing the bloody wound, is a piece of realism as offensive as unnecessary, and that the appearance of dead bodies lying about the stage for a length of time is more sensational than agreeable. Setting such matters aside, the act strikes us as extremely powerful. One forgets the relationship of Tristan and Isolde in the absorbing interest created by the situation, while the closing scene is remarkable for the dignity and pathos of its central figure. As a whole, the drama compares very favourably with the Ring. We may object to its sensuousness, but cannot remain unconscious of its strong human interest, or the frequent beauty of the poetic ideas.

The music of Tristan und Isolde illustrates, as already pointed out, the ultimate development of Wagner's theory. If not, we are unable to conceive how even that daring genius could wander further from what is lawful and right. In its desperate defiance of all rule and order, save the composer's own, it either creates anger or amusement, according as the hearer is in a grave or lightsome mood. Indeed, one has to struggle against the unworthy idea that Wagner, when writing his music, tried to fathom the faith and devotion of his followers by seriously offering them an absurdity. An absurdity—we hold by the term, despite occasional pages full of charm, and in view of melodies which here and there light up the work with beauty, inspired by the good angel who never altogether deserts this gifted man; in view, likewise, of orchestration frequently marvellous for depth and variety of colour. These things are like a few stars shining through rifts in a cloudy sky. They but emphasize the prevailing gloom. The question, after all, is one of artistic principles, on which ground alone can it be properly argued. It but slightly affects the main issue, therefore, to admit or deny Wagner's genius in carrying out his theory, and the true significance of Tristan und Isolde consists in the light thrown upon that theory by the the work. The light, we gladly own, is so clear that no mistake can be charged to the account of obscurity. He who runs may read. And what does he read? First, that vocal melody has hardly a a place on the lyric stage. Save for a few passages wherein the voice is permitted to drift, as by accident, into the "infinite melos" of the orchestra, Tristan und Isolde is one long bout of declamation. Small musical interest is allowed on the stage; and nature's own beautiful instrument remains, for musical purposes well nigh silent. No argument, however far fetched from the depths of philosophy or the heights of transcendentalism can defend this wilful neglect of heaven-sent means. As well might one seek to justify a man who shuts out the sun and lives by candle light. What next does our running reader read? That dramatic music is a form of art destitute of any claim of its own needing to be considered. Wagner talks poetically in Oper und Drama of a marriage between music and poetry. If marriage be illustrated at all in Tristan und Isolde, it is marriage in which the woman, Music, has no rights, but becomes a slave to the man, Poetry. The lordly Word stalks hither and thither, and the subservient Tone follows, not daring to call its soul its own. This is not union, but domination on the one side and humiliation on the other. Music so treated loses its dignity, and, which is of greater practical consequence, stands forth deprived of its essential charm. Without order there can be no art, and every art, to remain such, must have its own order, not that of another. But the order of music in this case is not its own. Viewed from the standpoint of its natural laws the chaotic thing resembles in character, if not in significance, the improvisation of a player who, letting his fancy drift, devotes himself to the evasion of a "full close." This "new art" is like the sun, which, says the nursery poet, "never tires nor stops to rest." It streams on with no point of repose for ear or mind, constantly exciting hopes of the completion of a sentence, or, at any rate, the end of a paragraph; but, like Flora in "Little Dorrit," always starting afresh in supreme defiance alike of punctuation and sense. Without insisting upon formal melody, we are entitled to ask how the musical "period" has offended that it should be put under ban in favour of a mixed mob of interrupted cadences. What next does our running reader read? That dramatic music may be more often ugly than beautiful. Beauty, we admit, is not an absolute term, and the conditions under which some people proclaim its existence are frequently astonishing to others. Still, it is divided from ugliness by a wide space, and across that space a good deal of the Tristan und Isolde music may be found. Wagner's score is a very wilderness of diminished chords—a mighty gathering of forlorn members of the "tone families" looking out for relations, and finding none. How they crowd on each other, those diminished chords, tripping each other up, and pressing forward in unending but disorderly and excruciating procession! As for the members of the "tone families," never was lot as hard as theirs. Parents and children, brothers and sisters proclaim a natural affinity which every sensitive ear recognizes; but Wagner's stern will handcuffs them to total strangers and whips them along regardless. Is the result music? It may be, and, if so, music is a very disagreeable thing, provocative of pain and wrath. Let us thereupon amend Shakspere at once, making him say that he who hath not music in his soul is just the man to trust. It will be urged that there are many immensely stimulating passages in Tristan und Isolde—passages which seem to take hold of the listener and carry him with them. That is true, but when looked into their secret is not of an exalted order, because based upon the physical sensations produced by noise. The sharpening of a saw, a crash of thunder, the murmur of a multitude, all appeal in some form or other to human nerves. So do the uproarious sounds of our modern orchestras, thus deluding many worthy people into the belief that they are enjoying music when, in reality, that art is not present. The true hearing of music is by the organs of the soul, which refuse cognizance to mere noises, however skilfully organized and physically exciting. In conclusion, while recognizing in Tristan und Isolde the wonderful genius common to all Wagner's later works, we absolutely reject its principles as false to art and nature. But the work will do little harm. When the bird is looking on it is useless to spread the net, and the net is very visible indeed which here would lure public taste to destruction.—D. T.

ZÜRICH MUSIC FESTIVAL.

Thanks to the kindness of Professor C. Riedel, of Leipzig, I have been furnished with more detailed particulars than as yet have been made public of the music to be performed at the forthcoming gathering of the Allgemeine Deutsche Musik-verein at Zürich.

It should be premised that the Allgemeine Deutsche Musik-verein (General German Musical Association), which owes its existence mainly to the efforts of Canon Liszt, was founded at Weimar in 1861, and has for its aim the cultivation and advancement of musical art, principally, by the institution of periodical meetings of its members, the performance of new works by living composers, and the revival of neglected masterpieces. Since its establishment, festivals have been held almost annually in several of the most important cities of Germany. This will be the first occasion of the Association extending its operations beyond the borders of Fatherland. It has been suggested, therefore, that in future the word "German" should be dropped from its "style."

The projected festival lasts from the 8th to the 12th of July. The band, under the direction of Herr Fritz Hegar of Zürich, will consist of the Zürich Tonhalle Orchestra, augmented by the Court and Town Orchestras of Stuttgardt, with a chorus of 360 voices. The scheme includes three orchestral and vocal concerts—two for chamber-music, and one, in the cathedral, for organ and sacred music. Among the most important works to be performed are Liszt's oratorio, St Elizabeth; Albert Becker's Mass in B flat minor; Brahms's Nänie; Saint-Säens's cantata, La Lyre et la Harpe; Hans Huber's Tell Symphony; Ed. Munzinger's Nero Symphony; a Scherzo by Nicodé; a Pianoforte Suite by MacDowell; a String Quartet by Rimsky-Korsakoff; a Pianoforte Trio by Gustav Weber; and a String Quartet, "Engelgesang," by Liszt.

Tourists in Switzerland, who have not been satiated with the novelties of the London musical season, will here find, probably, more than enough in the way of novelty to content them. The pleasantest route to Zürich, it should be noted, is unquestionably by the Rhine and the Black Forest Railway, which, besides being a marvel of engineering, passes through magnificent scenery, and close by the Falls of the Rhine, at Schaffhausen, the view of which, for railway passengers at least, has by no means been spoilt by a railway bridge having been thrown across the river, just above the Falls—but that it improves the view from below can by no means be said. C. A. B.

MUSICAL COPYRIGHT.

SIR,—Musical amateurs are indebted to The Times for calling attention to an old-standing grievance upon this question; but may I suggest that the remedy is not merely to print upon music "Right of performance reserved," but to take the right of performance out of the copyright of purely musical compositions altogether? There are a multitude of choral societies in England which give concerts and entertainments charging a small sum for admission, not with the idea of obtaining profit, but simply to defray expenses. The glees performed by these societies are almost all of them copyright, and if the publishers were to insist upon their legal rights they could claim a royalty in every case. To do so, however, would be to place a ban upon the sale of the glees, and the law is consequently allowed to remain in abeyance; but it is not a pleasant thing for those who have charge of such concerts to know that their immunity from legal proceedings rests upon the publishers' forbearance. The price of copyright songs is considerably more than the price of those which are not copyright, and the enhanced price is quite wide enough to pay for the copyright. By the performance of a song or glee an advertisement is given to it which increases the demand for copies of the work; indeed, professional singers are often offered large sums to induce them to sing new songs.

Songs are not analogous to plays in this respect, as the print of a new play is comparatively rarely purchased by the public. Immediately, however, a song is well received the demand for copies is enormous. The price paid for a song or glee ought in justice to include the privilege of singing it under any circumstances.—Yours faithfully, S. W. M.

Hull, June 12.

HAMBURGH.—The Singers' Festival for next August is assuming larger proportions than was expected. Preparations deemed ample for the reception of 6,000 singers had been made, but 8,000 already announce their intention of assisting, and "the cry is still: they come." Hopes, however, are entertained that this additional demand on the resources of the old Hanse town may be successfully met.

NEW YORK.—Chickering Hall was completely filled on the occasion of the testimonial concert to Mdme Anna Bishop. It was not only a pecuniary but an artistic success, and the heartfelt applause was additional evidence of the respect in which Mdme Bishop is held. The concert was one of those entertainments that give pleasure to every performer and auditor. It commanded the services of distinguished artists and the attendance of the most cultivated musical people of New York. It is not necessary to state that Mdme Bishop has won laurels in every part of the globe. After a half-century devoted to the practice of her art, she can give an example by which the latest generation may profit. Last night she sang "Robert, toi que j'aime" in a style befitting the composition, and substituted, by way of encore, "Home, Sweet Home," with the perfect enunciation that invariably marks her performances. In "Let the bright seraphim" Mdme Bishop gave an example of that legitimate method which has enabled her to preserve her vocal powers to so late a day. It was beautifully sung, and deserved the enthusiastic applause it received. Mdme Lablache gave "Fac ut portem," from Rossini's Stabat Mater, and "Ah, mon fils," from Meyerbeer's Prophète, in her finest style. Miss Beebe, who made her first appearance since her return from England, sang as charmingly as ever, and was heartily welcomed; and Mdme Chatterton-Bohrer again proved herself an accomplished harpist. Mrs Knox also sang, and Mr Sebastian Bach Mills, the highly esteemed pianist, who played with his accustomed skill, had to comply with an encore. There were other attractions in the programme.—New York Times, May 28.

Besides the Genzingers, it was principally the von Greiner, Martinez, Weigl, and Frieberth families, together with the musical household of Hofrath von Ries, towards whom Haydn felt attracted. He had likewise always business matters to transact in Vienna with Artaria and took as much advantage as he could of operas and concerts. The musicians who gave the tone in the Austrian capital looked on him rather as a stranger in consequence of his appointment in Hungary, and were far from considering him their equal, much less their superior. He complains of a host of "envious persons and enemies." He first experienced their influence in connection with an opera he wrote by the Emperor's order for the National Theatre and the performance of which was prevented. Between 1780 and 1790, Haydn had especial enemies on the Emperor's musical establishment, the musical director, Kreibich, and the lackey, Strack, doing all they could to hinder his quartets from being heard, a task they did not find difficult, for never under any circumstances was the Emperor Joseph very partial to Haydn's "jokes."

"My misfortune is only my residence in the country," Haydn once wrote to Artaria. But his very appointment at Esterhazy was attended, on the other hand, with endless advantages for developing his powers, and the Abbé Vogler justly asserted there was nothing for which Haydn was to be so much envied as this post, in which, with his talent, he must have become a great man. Of what incalculable value to him was his constant intercourse with the orchestra! Pohl puts this very happily in the following words: "For him the orchestra was a living score in which he could erase or add as he chose." Haydn's industry at Esterhazy was something marvellous. He wrote there a dozen Italian operas; 63 symphonies; 44 string quartets; five masses; the oratorio, Il Ritorno di Tobia; and Die Sieben Worte am Kreuz; besides a great many overtures, concertos, pieces of chamber-music, and songs. Departing from the version now become mythical, Pohl thus tells the touching story of the "Abschied's Symphonie": In consequence of want of room, the Prince ordered the musicians to move their wives and children from Esterhazy to the neighbouring village of Eisenstadt. In vain did the poor husbands apply to Papa Haydn. On this occasion he did not undertake to act as their mediator with the Prince but merely had a roguish smile for them. It was not till the next orchestral rehearsal that his humorous plan of campaign became clear to them. We know that in the finale of this Symphony each musician rises, one after the other, and blows out his light, till only two violins are left. As Haydn was preparing to follow the last one, the Prince, touched by what he saw, went up to Haydn and said: "I have understood perfectly what you mean; the musicians yearn for their homes; very well, to-morrow we will pack up." The story is highly characteristic of Haydn's love of fun and kindly disposition.

In information of a purely musical nature concerning Haydn's mode of conducting, composing, &c., &c., Pohl's Second Volume is exceedingly rich. Yet, with all his love and veneration for the Master, he is free from exaggerated and blind admiration, as he shows more especially in his criticism of the oratorio: Il Ritorno di Tobia, of the very over-rated Sieben Worte, and, lastly, of the operas and songs. Among the last there is only one, "Der schlaue Pudel" (commonly called the "Pudel-Romanze"), which was always remarkable. As Pohl tells us, Haydn wrote it in compliance with the request of an officer's daughter at Coburg. The text forwarded (twenty stanzas!) described the sagacity of a Poodle, who succeeded in finding a thaler which had been hidden away. The Lady, who was in love with a Captain, the owner of the Poodle, thought she might enchain him more securely by a surprise, and, as he was an admirer of Haydn's, she begged the latter to set the little adventure to music, adding, however, at the same time that she was poor and hoped, therefore, he would be satisfied with the ducat she sent in her letter. Haydn wrote the song and forwarded it with the ducat to his fair correspondent, but jokingly begged a pair of garters from her as a punishment for her having believed he could be selfish and ungallant. The garters, made of red and white silk with a garland and forget-me-nots painted on them, arrived in due course, and Haydn kept them carefully with his jewels.

A thoroughly new discovery, for which we are indebted to Pohl, is that Haydn was——a Freemason. For a man of Haydn's correct religious sentiments, this sounds somewhat strange. Haydn certainly did not enter heart and soul into the business like Mozart; his freemasonry forms only a transient episode, scarcely known, in his life. According to Pohl's conjecture, it may have been his friend and patron, von Greiner, who encouraged him to enter the "Eintracht" Lodge, where he was solemnly initiated on the 4th February, 1785. The "Herr von Weber" who acted at the ceremony as his proposer was in all probability Franz Anton von Weber, father of Karl Maria.

Some of the most delightful portions of the book are those concerning the personal relations existing between Mozart and Haydn. We feel moved, and our minds are truly raised when we read with what an absence of aught like envy the two Masters mutually esteemed and honoured each other. For two men to stand on such a footing to one another is something very uncommon at all times, and more especially so, perhaps, in our own day. When L. Kozeluch, in Mozart's presence, ventured to find fault with Haydn's Quartets, Mozart called to him angrily: "Sir, if we were both melted down together, we should be far from making one Haydn!" And Haydn, after a performance of Don Juan, happening to be among a number of persons who found a great deal to blame in that opera, and being asked what he thought, replied: "I cannot settle the dispute, but this I know—Mozart is the greatest composer the world possesses."—The Second Volume ends with the breaking up of the Prince's musical establishment at Esterhazy, and Haydn's departure for London on the 15th December, 1790. In order to pourtray all Haydn's surroundings, Pohl has interpolated in the Biography properly so called a "Vienna Chronicle," containing the most important information regarding musical matters at Court, among the aristocracy, and in private houses; about theatres and concerts, the state of sacred music, of the music trade, and of the manufacture of musical instruments in Haydn's time. Of great value to the musician is the "Chronological and Thematic Catalogue of Haydn's Compositions," given in the form of an appendix, a conscientious and careful piece of work, superior to aught of its kind yet published. On the title-page there is a very fine half-length engraving of Haydn, after a water-colour portrait on ivory executed between 1780 and 1790. We will conclude our notice of this rich Second Volume by expressing a wish that the author will follow it up very soon with the third. The best preparatory work for the latter is already written, and was published by him in 1867: I mean the excellent monography, Haydn and Mozart in London.

"A DAY IN THE COUNTRY."

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—Last year some of your readers were generously led to help us in providing a day's excursion into the country for 500 poor girls and boys who attend the Hackney Juvenile Mission. The manager hopes to be able to take at least as many children this summer, and I should be glad if your readers will assist him practically by sending donations towards this tenth annual excursion either to the Hon. Manager, Mr J. Newmann, 117, Cheapside, E.C., Mr C. B. Lowe, Mr H. M. Heath, 4, St Thomas Road, or to yours faithfully, TOULOUSE.—A committee, with Mériel, director of the Conservatory, as chairman, has been formed for the purpose of erecting a statue to Delayrac, in Muret, his native town.

WEIMAR.—A rather ancient "novelty," Hamlet, an opera by A. Stadtfeld, has been produced at the Grand Ducal Theatre. The composer, by birth a German, but, thanks to the liberality of Leopold I., a pupil of the Brussels Conservatory, died as far back as 1853, aged only 27. "His opera of Hamlet, which," says the Leipsic Signale, "was accepted at the Grand Opera, Paris, but owing to his death never performed there, is characterized by musical talent; some parts are highly effective, but others are decidedly too long. The text differs materially from Shakspere's tragedy. The central figure is Hamlet's mother. Hamlet, whom the ghost of his murdered father urges to revenge, kills the King, his uncle, and ascends the throne, after his mother, thoroughly penitent, has committed suicide. The opera was well performed."

CHESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

The second day of the Festival has been crowned by a measure of success not less gratifying than that of yesterday. The weather was more favourable, the neighbourhood of the Cathedral was again unwontedly active, and the audience appeared as large as at Elijah. The works performed in the Cathedral were Dr Arthur Sullivan's Prodigal Son, Beethoven's C Minor Symphony, and Spohr's Last Judgment. Between the Symphony and Spohr's oratorio there was an interval of about an hour and a half, during which the visitors left the Cathedral; so that there were, strictly speaking, two day performances. The financial success of the Festival is already assured, and the Restoration Fund will receive a substantial contribution. There was again a short service before the performance, and Dr. Pole's motet was repeated. In concert halls we are sometimes entreated to withhold our cheers at performances of oratorio, but there the appeal is often in vain; in the church the influence of the place is so strong that the solo singers have to content themselves with the divine homage of silence; and though one unhappy being—I am sorry to have to say he was a clergyman—almost deprived the excellent conductor of his presence of mind by so far forgetting himself as to clap his hands, the consternation of those who heard him was in itself an example of the general sentiment of the audience.

The Prodigal Son was first performed at the Worcester Festival of 1869, and there were competent critics who believed, after hearing it, that the genius of its gifted composer had found its most congenial outcome in sacred oratorio. The work is not of gigantic proportions, nor can it be classed with the oratorios of Handel and Mendelssohn. Mr Sullivan, however, had not only produced an interesting musical version of this pathetic parable, but displayed such scholarship, such insight into the secrets of the old masters, and such dramatic power, that his admirers were not over extravagant when they confidently insisted that he would prove a legitimate successor to the composer of Elijah. Their hopes were encouraged when, a year or two afterwards, his more important oratorio, The Light of the World, was brought out at a Birmingham Festival. This, however, was the last work of the kind the public has had from Mr Sullivan, and the question is often asked why a composer of such exceptional gifts and ripe experience should have abandoned this lofty region of art.* It might be answered that a composer is himself best qualified to judge of the true bent of his own genius; it is also unhappily true that only a few musicians can afford to soar into altitudes where there is no public to encourage them, and that a labourer even in art has some right to look for reward. In these days we are not in the habit of subscribing large sums for copies of new oratorios, and I remember hearing of a distinguished musician who, after devoting months of study and work to the writing and producing of an oratorio which attracted a crowded and brilliant audience on its first performance at a great festival, received as the only recompense for twelve months' anxiety and toil the record of a vote of a committee cordially thanking him and congratulating him "on the marked success of his work." This was of course very gratifying, but so long as new oratorios don't bring in sixpences, and the Pirates easily levy gold enough to pay a king's ransom, it cannot be surprising that we do not hear of the probability of another oratorio by the composer of The Light of the World. These reflections will be readily understood by all who had the good fortune to be at the performance of The Prodigal Son this morning.

When the work was first heard at Worcester Mr Sullivan had the assistance of Mr. Sims Reeves and Mr Santley, and those who were present still talk with enthusiasm of the wonderfully fervid singing of the great English tenor, who moved even the most callous by his superb delivery; while Mr Sims Reeves himself admitted that he owed much to the help of his distinguished colleague, whose achievements on that day are also well remembered. But it is possible to recall such memories without being unmindful of the merits of the admirable quartet of soloists who sang this morning. Mdme Patey was, if we mistake not, one of the original interpreters of the oratorio; but she never sang the plaintive air, "Love not the world," more feelingly; and Miss Marriott has not displayed greater taste and judgment than in her rendering of "O that thou hadst harkened to my commandment"—a beautiful and expressive air if there ever was one. Mr Maas sang the music of the Prodigal for the first time, and gave "I will arise" like a true artist. Mr King again won well-deserved praise, and confirmed the favourable impression created yesterday. In the exquisite and only too short duet, "Father, I have sinned," both were heard at their best, and the effect at its conclusion was apparent in a manifestation more eloquent than applause. There were signs of fatigue on the part of the choralists this morning, long rehearsals and performances day and night telling their inevitable tale. But one or two numbers were given with commendable vigour and accuracy, and "Lord God of Heaven" was a fine display of intelligent and effective singing. During this the whole audience stood, though the Sanctus in Elijah yesterday was heard without the same mark of reverence. Dr Bridge had again good cause to be proud of his orchestra. The prelude and accompaniments to the oratorio, exceedingly picturesque, were all played admirably. It had been hoped that Dr Sullivan would conduct the Prodigal Son, but a recent domestic affliction unhappily prevented his carrying out his intention.

Good music is said to be worthy of being heard anywhere, and therefore the doubt about the appropriateness of a cathedral as a place for the performance of a great symphony is probably the result of prejudice; but we are all dependent creatures, and association is a powerful factor. I have heard imaginative amateurs say that on hearing such music as Mozart's Requiem they were transported into a Gothic church; and probably not a few of those who heard Beethoven's C minor Symphony this morning almost fancied themselves in a concert room. One might have expected to hear loud applause at the end of the successive movements. Though the performance was remarkably good in some of the more delicate passages, the effect would have been clearer in a less lofty building.

Spohr's Last Judgment is never heard to such advantage as in a cathedral; its sombre character, the religious tone of the music, and the solemnity of the subject rendering it specially adapted for festival use. Accordingly this oratorio often impresses a general audience even more powerfully than works of higher intrinsic value. The overture and the symphony introductory to the second part were played with fine effect, and in no music have the members of the choir displayed more thorough appreciation than in the choruses of The Last Judgment. The solos were apportioned to Miss Mary Davies, Mdme Mudie-Bolingbroke, Messrs Guy and Hilton, all of whom sang not only with accuracy but with proper observance of the character of the text.

There was a very large audience in the Music Hall to-night at the second concert, for which an interesting programme had been arranged. Dr J. F. Bridge's dramatic cantata, Boadicea, was the principal work, but the committee further showed their appreciation of music by English composers in giving a selection from Mr Villiers Stanford's The Veiled Prophet, and a spirited march from Mr E. Prout's Alfred. Nearly all the leading singers engaged at the festival appeared, and that popular favourite, Mdme Marie Roze, made her début in this city.

Boadicea has been so frequently heard in various parts of the kingdom that it can no longer be called a novelty; and the favourable verdicts of other towns, including Manchester, have not been contradicted by the reception at Chester. Dr Bridge conducted the performance of his cantata, and I have his authority for saying that it was the finest he had heard. Doubtless the rehearsals have been a labour of love to the composer's brother, the choruses being full of interest, the subject a good one, and the libretto from a skilful hand. In the first place Dr Bridge is a musician, learned without being dry, and his melodies are fresh and attractive, never commonplace. No one could hear Boadicea under such exceptionally advantageous circumstances without recognizing in the Westminster Abbey organist a diligent student of orchestral effect. It was his good fortune to secure the assistance of Miss Marriott and Mr Maas, for whom the soprano and tenor solos were originally written, and these able artists were efficiently supported by Mdme Mudie-Bolingbroke and Mr King. At the end of the performance Dr Bridge was enthusiastically cheered.

COBURG.—It has been determined to have a special operatic company again at the Ducal Theatre at least from October to March annually, provided the Municipality continues the grant of 5,000 marks made last year to the company from Nuremberg. This is agreed to without dissent.

VIENNA.—Herr Geissler, formerly Chief-Inspector and Keeper of the Archives at the Imperial Opera, who was compelled to give up his post, has won an action brought for wrongful dismissal, the Court awarding him a year and a half's salary, with the right to a pension.—Having been required by the authorities to make further alterations in their premises, the Society of the Friends of Music reply that to do so would be tantamount to self-destruction. "The dissolution," they observe, "of a Society which has existed for seventy years, and always laboured for philanthropic and artistic ends, is synonymous with that of the first school of music in the Empire—the Vienna Conservatory." They further state that every possible precaution against fire has already been adopted. On this point the Corporation have asked for a special report.

Queries to be answered,
Problems to be solved.
—Old Poem.

Dear Punch,—About a twelvemonth since I put certain questions which required certain answers. I intended them chiefly, after the manner, as it were, of Dr Macfarren, in his "Pills for Candidates." Among others I asked for a fugal development of the theme subjoined:—

After waiting in vain for a lengthened period, I received, from the master to whom my requisition was addressed—the Commendatore Francesco Schira—not only the Fugue of which I was in search, but also a canon on the octave, with free bass. The fugue, to which no master would be ashamed to attach his signature (had he written it) is too long to find space in these columns (which I sincerely regret): but here, in extenso, is the "canon on the octave, with free bass":—

CANONE.

Now, dear Punch, I require you, of your courtesy, to tell me whence the theme is derived.

PARSIFALIANA.

III.

Commenting upon my rendering of the words "Ein Bühnenweihfestspiel" by "A Sacred Festival Stage Play" or "A Sacred Musical Drama," which under "Parsifaliana II." appeared in the Musical World of June 2nd, my friend Fr. Niecks writes to me as follows. Quoting Bret Harte's "Plain language from truthful James," he says:

"Like 'the heathen Chinee,' Wagner is occasionally peculiar 'for ways that are dark and for tricks that are vain'; I, therefore, shall beware of asserting that your interpretation of the compound 'Bühnenweihfestspiel' is erroneous. Nevertheless, I may venture to tell you that the more obvious meaning of the word is 'Stage Dedication Festival Play,' namely, a 'Stage Festival Play,' intended for the inauguration or for the anniversary of the inauguration of a theatre. Compare 'Bühnenweihe' with 'Kirchweihe.' The latter word has two significations: (1) Dedication of a church, and (2) Anniversary of dedication. No doubt you have been present at a German 'Kirchweihe' (also called 'Kirchmesse,' 'Kirmes,' or 'Kirmse,' on account of the Mass said in celebration of the anniversary), and enjoyed its ecclesiastical solemnities and secular gaieties, such as feasting and dancing. Where the English version of the Bible has 'feast of dedication' (John x. 22,) Luther has 'Kirchweihe.' Of course you remember the word 'Weihe' (consecration, dedication, inauguration) in the title of Beethoven's overture (Op. 124), Zur Weihe des Hauses, which the master wrote for the opening of the Josephstadt Theatre in Vienna. The above interpretation is the one which analogy and the νοῦς of the language dictate; but a 'Bühnenfestspiel' may of course mean a 'Festspiel' for the ennobling, elevation, and sanctifying of the stage."

My friend, F. Corder, whose word as a German scholar, and as the translator of Tristan und Isolde, Die Meistersinger, Der Ring des Nibelungen, &c., should bear weight, writes:

"Applied to Parsifal, the word 'Weih' does not necessarily imply anything sacred, but simply 'inaugural.' Wagner would have been right in calling the Ring an 'inaugural festival play,' but the term has no meaning whatever applied to Parsifal. 'Sacred Musical Drama,' or 'Sacred Festival Drama,' is, indeed, the right title for the work, but that is just what 'Bühnenweihfestspiel' does not mean."

However, reference to Hilpert's German Dictionary seems to show that it may be used in this sense. Therein "Weihen" (in Old German, "Wihan") is explained to have originally been synonymous with the Greek and Latin, ἔρδειν and facere, both of which are used for "to sacrifice," i.e., "to perform sacred rites." Further, "ein geweihter Ort" = a sacred spot; Weih-altar = a holy or consecrated altar. But whether Wagner, who can be plain and outspoken enough at times, but more generally delights in oracular utterances, actually intends the word to bear the meaning of "Sacred," "Religious," "Consecrative," "Inaugural," or "Commemorative of inauguration," must remain a mystery till he himself condescends to enlighten us. JUDAISM IN MUSIC.*

To branch off in this direction, I must first once more touch especially upon my own personal interest. I just said incidentally that the persecution got up against me by the Jews had not yet been able to estrange from me the public, who everywhere received me warmly. This is correct. But I must now add that this persecution is certainly calculated, if not to close up for me the paths to the public, at least to render them so difficult that, in this respect as well as in others, the success of the hostile efforts appears likely to become at length complete. You already find that, after my earlier operas made their way at nearly all the theatres of Germany, where they were given with invariable success, every one of my later works has to contend with a slothful, nay, even an inimically repelling, demeanour in the same theatres; the fact is, my earlier works had forced their way upon the stage before the Jewish agitation commenced, and their success could not be greatly impaired. But now it was said that my new works were written according to the "stupid" theories I had subsequently published; that I had fallen with them from my earlier innocence: and that no living being could listen to my music any more. Now, just as Judaism generally, merely by taking advantage of what is weak and faulty in our system, could strike root among us, the agitation, in this instance, also, quickly found a soil, in which—sufficiently to our discredit—everything is prepared for its final success. In whose hands are our theatres, and what is the tendency pursued in them? On this head I have expressed my opinions both frequently and sufficiently, having, last of all, explained at length, in my long treatise upon German Art and German Politics, the widely ramified reasons for the decay of our theatrical art. Do you think that, by so doing, I rendered myself popular in those quarters which were affected by what I said? It is only with the strongest disinclination, as they have shown, that the managements of theatres determine on producing one of my more recent works;* they might, however, be compelled to do so by the universally favourable bearing of the public towards my operas; how welcome to them must, therefore, be the excuse that my more recent works are so generally opposed in the press, and, moreover, in its most influential organs? Do you not already hear the question thrown out from Paris why any one should consider himself bound to urge the transfer of my operas thither, a most difficult venture even of itself, when my artistic significance is not even recognized in my own country?—This state of things is rendered still more serious by the fact of my really not offering my recent productions to any theatre, but being compelled, on the contrary, to reserve the right of tacking on to my permission, if it happens to be desired, for the representation of a new work, conditions I never before considered necessary—namely, the fulfilment of demands which shall guarantee me a really correct representation of my work.† And with this I now touch upon the serious side of the injury resulting from the admixture of the Jewish element in our matters of art.

In my earlier article preceding this, I showed finally that it was the weakness and impotency of the post-Beethovenian period of our German musical productivity which permitted the admixture of the Jews in it; all those musicians of ours who found in the obliteration of the grand plastic style of Beethoven the ingredients for the preparation of the modern, formless, shallow manner, washed over with a slight, dull coating of apparent solidity, and who went on composing in it with heedless complacency, and without life or aspirations, I mentioned as most certainly included in the musical Judaism described by me, no matter the nationality to which they might belong. It is this peculiar set which comprises pretty nearly all who compose, and—unfortunately—direct music. I believe that many of them were rendered honestly confused and frightened by my writings on art; it was their honest confusion and perplexity on which the Jews, exasperated at my previous article, seized, for the purpose of immediately cutting short anything like a becoming discussion of my other theoretical theses, as at first there was a remarkable tendency on the part of many honourable German musicians to render such a discussion possible. With the two or three cries already named, this fructifying, explanatory, purifying, and improving investigation and mutual understanding was kept under.—The same weakly spirit lived, however, in consequence of the ravages occasioned by Hegel's philosophy in German heads, so partial to abstract meditation, in this sphere, as well as in the sphere, belonging to it, of æsthetics, after Kant's great idea, so cleverly employed by Schiller for establishing æsthetic views of the Beautiful, had been compelled to make way for a wild confused mass of dialectic futilities expressing nothing. But even here I met at first with an inclination, an honest wish, to go into the views laid down in my works on art. The libel on The Musically Beautiful, already mentioned, by Dr. Hanslick, of Vienna, having been written for an express purpose, was, with the greatest haste, speedily rendered so famous, that a goodnatured and thoroughly blond German æsthetician, Herr Vischer, who, in carrying out a great system had to bother himself with the artiele, "Music," cannot well be blamed, because, for his convenience and satisfaction, he associated himself with the so highly lauded musical æsthetician of Vienna; for his great work, Herr Vischer confided to the æsthetician this article, of which he confessed he understood nothing.‡ Thus, then, Jewish musical beauty was installed in the very heart of a thoroughly German system of æsthetics; this tended to increase the celebrity of its author still more; it was now extravagantly praised in the press, while, on account of its great prolixity, no one ever read it. Under the additional protection, arising from this fresh celebrity, which was, moreover, completely Christian and German, Jewish musical beauty was raised to a perfect dogma. The most peculiar and the most difficult questions in the æsthetics of music, questions on which

* It would not be uninstructive, but, at any rate, characteristic of the state of art-matters among us, were I to expatiate at any length on the system adopted, to my great astonishment, by our two largest theatres, at Berlin and Vienna, towards me, with reference to my Meistersinger. In my negotiations with the directors of these two Court theatres, it required some time before I perceived from the tricks employed by them that not only was it their object not to produce my work themselves but to prevent its being given at other theatres. You will not fail to perceive plainly from this that there is an actual tendency active here, and that there was evidently real alarm felt at the appearance of anything new by me. Perhaps it may one day amuse you to learn something more about this out of my experiences.

† It was only by my giving up these stipulations, from a feeling of absolute necessary consideration for my publisher, that I was recently able to induce the Theatre Royal, Dresden, to resolve on bringing out my Meistersinger.

‡ This Herr Vischer himself once told me at Zurich: In what degree the co-operation of Herr Hanslick was personal and immediately participating, is something of which I am ignorant.

the greatest philosophers, immediately they wanted to say anything really important had always expressed themselves with conjectural uncertainty, were now taken up by Jews and bamboozled Christians with such assurance that anyone who really wished to think seriously on the subject, and more especially desired to explain the overpowering impression produced upon his mind by Beethoven's music, could not help feeling pretty much as though he were listening to the sale of the Saviour's garments to Jew old-clothes-men at the foot of the cross—a subject on which the celebrated Biblical investigator, David, would probably discourse as cleverly and lucidly as on the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven.

All this was necessarily attended by the further result that when, in opposition to this system, as constantly active as it was unproductive, any attempt was to be made to strengthen the spirit of art, which was languishing more and more, we came not only upon the natural obstacles, which always exist in the way of attempts of this kind, but upon a completely organized opposition, as which alone the elements comprised in it were capable of manifesting themselves. If we appeared dumb and resigned, there was nothing done in the opposite camp that could be considered as will, effort, or productivity; on the contrary, it was precisely the believers in purely Jewish musical beauty who were permitted to do anything, and every new calamity à la Offenbach was allowed to burst over that system of German art, without a soul's stirring; this you will doubtless think "a matter of course." If, however, any one, myself for instance, felt urged, by any encouraging and favourable circumstances, to take in hand artistic resources that offered themselves to me, for the purpose of conducting them to energetic activity, you heard, my dear Madam, the cries this called forth on all sides. On such occasions fire and strength were infused into the community of modern Israel! What struck one more than anything else on such occasions was the contempt, the utterly disrespectful tone inspired, I believe, not only by blind passion, but by the very clear-sighted calculation of its inevitable effect upon the protectors of my enterprises; for who does not at last feel struck by the contemptuous tone universally employed when speaking about the man for whom one shows, before the whole world, genuine reverence and profound confidence? Universally and in every relation which is to be applied to complicated undertakings, there exist the very natural elements of the ill-will felt by the persons not interested (or, also, too deeply interested) in it; how easy a task does it become, thanks to this contemptuous demeanour on the part of the press, for all these persons to make the undertaking appear suspicious even in the eyes of its patrons? Can anything of the sort ever happen in France to a Frenchmen who is a favourite of the public, or in Italy to a popular Italian composer? What could happen only to a German in Germany was so new, that we had to begin by searching for the reasons of it. You, my dear Madam, were surprised at it; the persons who are concerned in this dispute, ostensibly about the interests of art, but who have other grounds for opposing undertakings which emanate from me, are not astonished, however, but find everything perfectly natural.*

The result is, therefore, opposition, more and more resolutely carried out, to every enterprise which could obtain for my works and my labours an influence in matters of theatrical or musical art among us.

Does this mean anything?—I believe it means a great deal: and think that without presumption I may be heard on the subject. That I am entitled to attribute essential significance to my efforts I plainly perceive from the serious pains taken to avoid going into anything I have, at times, felt impelled to publish concerning these topics. (To be continued.)

Modjeska is to sail from Liverpool for America on the 22nd August.

* You may form a very sufficient notion of this, as well as of the manner in which the persons last mentioned employ the tone generally used in speaking of me for the purpose of stopping any interest shown for the promotion of my undertakings, if you will take the trouble to read through this New Year's number of the Süddeutsche Presse, which has just been sent me from Munich. Herr Julius Fröbel there denounces me boldly to the Bavarian Government as the founder of a sect which strives to sweep away the state and religion, all which it proposes to supply by an operahouse, from which to govern the country, besides holding forth a prospect of the gratification of "filthy longings."—Hebbel, now dead, once, when talking to me, characterized the degrading vulgarity peculiar to the Vienna comic actor, Nestroy, by saying that, if that person were to smell a rose, the rose must necessarily stink afterwards. How the idea of love, as the founder of society, is conceived in the brain of a man like Julius Fröbel, you here learn with similar effect.—But do you understand how cunningly such things are calculated to excite loathing, when they even cause the person calumniated to turn away from the castigation of the calumniator?

CONCERTS.

Crystal Palace.—About the last Saturday Concert, with its superb performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony and the presentation of a testimonial to Mr Manns, the zealous and admirable conductor of so long standing, we shall have something to say in our next.

Signor Arditi gave his "annual concert" on Friday evening, June 16, in the music room (beautifully decorated, by the way, in the Italian style by Signor Maroldo) at the residence of Mr Binney Smith, Maida Vale. Signor Arditi was sparing with his own compositions, only giving his Tarantella ("Vispa son gentile"), made so popular by Mdme Adelina Patti, to whom it is dedicated; a romanza, "Ah! se degg 'io lasciarti," and "La preghiera dell' Orfanella." The preghiera was most charmingly given by Mdlle Giulietta Arditi and unanimously encored, the songs first named being effectively rendered by Mdlle Scharwenka and Signor Runcio, both of whom were deservedly "re-called." Among the many successful pieces were "Nobil Signor" (Les Huguenots), sung in the original key, and just as the celebrated composer himself would have wished to hear it, by Mdme Rose Hersée; Pinsuti's "Bedouin's Love Song," entrusted to Signor Foli; Blumenthal's ever popular "Message," given by Mr Maas with all the requisite spirit and expression; Signor Tosti's "Good bye," sung with great and merited applause by Mdlle Giulietta Arditi; and Molloy's "Punchinello," by the always welcome Miss José Sherrington. The instrumentalists were M. Hollman (violoncello), who had to repeat his performance of a mazurka by Popper; M. Engel (harmonium), and Signor Tito Mattei (pianoforte). The accompanists were Signors Mattei, Fiori, Mazzoni, Celli, and Pinsuti (a "goodly company"). Signor Arditi occupied the simple post of "director of the music," how well and with what urbanity those acquainted with him need not be told. The rooms were crowded with rank and fashion, and the concert was thoroughly enjoyed from beginning to end.

M. Jules Lasserre.—The matinée musicale, given by this gentleman on Tuesday at the Marlborough Rooms, opened with a pianoforte quintet by Signor Sgambati, of whose concerto, performed at the fifth Philharmonic Concert, and symphony, introduced more recently at the Crystal Palace, a great deal was said in well-merited praise. The quintet, one of its composer's earlier works, is grandly and elaborately planned—too important in its aim and development, in fact, to be altogether understood and summarily judged of at one hearing. That Signor Sgambati is a pianist of high qualification, and a composer of undoubted originality, marked evidence was offered and accepted at the Philharmonic Concerts in question, and the good opinion suggested in each instance will doubtless be strengthened by further acquaintance with the quintet. Under the quieter circumstances of M. Lasserre's matinée, the finer qualities of Signor Sgambati's playing enjoyed a better chance of revelation than in the larger domain of St. James's Hall; and, as he deserved, so he won, hearty appreciative consideration, not only for his vigorous delivery of the pianoforte part in the quintet, but for his subsequent rendering of selections from Mozart, Liszt, and Chopin, which offered him a wide field wherein to test his varied and discursive artistic sympathies. In Signor Sgambati's work, as also in Beethoven's stringed quartet in E flat (Op. 74), a welcome incident in the programme, the services of M. Lasserre were found as valuable as when this experienced professor was in prominent commission at the concerts of the late Musical Union. M. Marsick, violinist for the occasion, besides serving both in the quintet and quartet, contributed a triad of solo movements, in which he exhibited rare skill, both legitimate and illegitimate, and which earned for him the undivided approval of his audience. Mdme Lasserre, who joined Signor Sgambati in a well known duet by Mozart for two pianofortes, deserves a golden word for the finished neatness of her playing, so thoroughly was it in consonance with the true Mozartean vein, with its luxuriant symmetry and form of expression.—H.

Mdme Sophie Menter.—Few can leave St James's Hall after one of Mdme Sophie Menter's "Recitals" without being impressed by the rare executive powers of this justly-famous pianist. On the other hand, few connoisseurs could have been satisfied with her recent public display, when, after giving excerpts from Bach, Mendelssohn, and Scarlatti so admirably, she may almost literally be said to have tossed Schubert in a blanket, through the medium of Liszt's "transcriptions" of four beautiful songs which we owe to the most richly-endowed and inexhaustible of song composers, (happily signed "Schubert-Liszt," so that no one can mistake them for Schubert pure). Our revered Canon has a right to commit to paper, on his own account, as many extravagances as may suit the whim of the moment—his illustration of the Legend of St Francis, also included in Mdme Menter's programme, for example; but he has not the right to travesty the spontaneous ideas of men so infinitely his superiors as Weber, Schubert, and Auber—whose Tarantella and March from Masaniello, by the way, are as mercilessly caricatured as the Lieder of Schubert. The late Herr Tausig in this matter was a worthy disciple of Canon Liszt, which emphatically appears in his "transcription" of Weber's Invitation à la Valse, tormented and defaced by the so-called "Arabesques," &c., of that noble "virtuoso," who has even meddled with the "Walkürenritt" of Wagner, so as to make it doubly unintelligible. "Wagner-Tausig," however, looks less uncongenial than "Schubert-Liszt," or anything else "Liszt" (even "St François marchant sur les flots-Liszt"). It should be added that in these transfigured pieces, Mdme Menter's exceptional talent, during the period absorbed by their delivery, seems transfigured in proportion. Her execution, on the contrary, of some of Chopin's pieces (including the Andante and Rondo Spianato) was perfect (excepting only the Tarantella, played at such speed as to rob it of all distinctness); and as much can be said of the two studies of Henselt, her rendering of which was almost irreproachable. With regard to power, when she chooses to exert it, Mdme Menter, on one instrument, would almost out-thunder Rubinstein and Von Bülow on two—the moral derived from all which is that our expertest modern virtuosi are fast ruining the legitimate art of pianoforte-playing. Such exceptions as Essipoff, Montigny-Rémaury, Sgambati, and Pachmann (the first and last more or less immediately Rubinstein's compatriots), are, therefore, welcome, and cannot be heard too often.—Graphic.

Miss Madalena Cronin.—A pianoforte recital was given by this lady on the 15th inst at the concert room of the Royal Academy of Music. The ability of Miss Cronin as an executant is too well known to require more than a passing word of recognition. Upon the present occasion she illustrated the catholicity of her skill by solo excerpts from Scarlatti, Handel, Chopin, and Liszt, and, in conjunction with Frederica Feddern (a pupil probably), Mendelssohn's Allegro Brillante in A (Op. 92) for two pianofortes, and with Signor Pezze, the violoncellist, Beethoven's Sonata in G minor (Op. 5) and Rubinstein's "Trois Morceaux" (Op. 11). Here was variety enough to conciliate all tastes, and it is no more than due to Miss Cronin to say that in every instance she showed a command of the instrument and a knowledge of the subject which did the highest credit to her attainments, in spite of the foreign competition with which it is the unlucky fortune of the native artist in these free trade times to be so unceasingly assailed. The singing was undertaken by Miss José Sherrington and Miss Helen Meason, the latter pleasing and unaffected vocalist gaining well-merited laurels by her delivery of songs by Pinsuti and others, which were, one and all, listened to with unfeigned pleasure and approbation.—H.

Mdme Christine Nilsson's concert on behalf of the English Church in Paris, announced for yesterday, promised to be a genuine success. The gifted, genial, and accomplished Swedish lady, as has been proved many times before, is as much a philanthropist as she is an artist.

Gaiety Theatre.—The brilliant series of performances, terminating gloriously with Le Sphinx, in which Madame Bernhardt-Damala has been the bright particular star, seems to have exhausted for the moment, in great measure, the interest of the London public in French plays. M. Coquelin, M. Febvre, and their associates of the Comédie Française made their first appearance here on Monday, before an audience certainly more scanty than might have been expected, considering the high reputation of the company. There was, moreover, the attraction of M. Augier's L' Aventurière, one of the most prominent pieces of the repertory, in which M. Coquelin repeats the character of Don Annibal, perhaps the most famous of all this admirable actor's impersonations.

German Opera, Drury Lane.—That Euryanthe, though containing some of the finest music composed by Weber, failed to impress the public may be easily explained. In the first place, on account of the absurdity of the plot it has never been popular even in Germany, and in the next, the execution, owing to inefficient preparation, was by no means up to the mark to which we have been accustomed by Herr Richter. On the other hand, Tristan und Isolde, the ne plus ultra of Wagnerian theory, brought into practice, was magnificently given from end to end—the finest performance in fact of the season.—Graphic.

Die Meistersinger was repeated on Thursday night and again on Friday, Winkelmann and Sucher playing Stolzing and Eva on the first, Franz Nachbauer and Wiedermann on the second occasion. Tristan und Isolde is announced for the second and last time to-night.

MR GANZ'S CONCERTS.

The programme of the last of these concerts for the present season contained no orchestral selection belonging to the "advanced" school, and experience of it was all the more agreeable in consequence. Latterly we have been so engrossed with new works remarkable rather for noise than music, or characterized by pretentiousness and little else, that a meeting with the great masters has somewhat the effect of running into a quiet haven out of a storm. Mr Ganz owed some reparation to his public. After harassing their nerves and offending their taste by a plentiful display of Liszian horrors, a corrective was clearly due. It came on Saturday with Schubert and Beethoven, Mendelssohn and Weber, and resembled that first day of spring, which, as one of our own poets hath said, "wipes from the heavens all unseemly stains." The concert opened with Schubert's beautiful and melodious overture known as Rosamunde, though not originally intended to prelude Helmina von Chezy's drama. The performance of this work was hardly adequate to its merits. If not coarse it nearly approached the commonplace, and so lacked refinement and finesse as to suggest an incomplete rehearsal. There is a tendency among conductors to let familiar things take their chance, and to concentrate every energy upon selections which happen to be new or of special importance. Having regard to the short and hurried preparation imposed by the exigencies of a busy London season this is both intelligible and natural. Still the fact remains that an orchestra and its chief are judged more by their handling of a theme the public know than by what they do with a novelty. It would pay, therefore, to look after such things as the overture to Rosamunde. Beethoven's fourth pianoforte concerto followed Schubert's work, the solo part being in the hands of M. de Pachmann, the Russian artist, whom Mr Ganz introduced to London amateurs a short while ago. M. de Pachmann did well by appearing on this occasion as an interpreter of a great classical composition, since only through such means can the merits of a performer be fully asserted. We now know not only the extent of his claims, but the measure of ability upon which they are based. In the first place, it does not strike us that M. de Pachmann has special qualifications for dealing with Beethoven. His performance on Saturday was lacking in breadth of style and in that largeness of conception which the greatest of imaginative musicians exacts from all who would worthily interpret him. If we were asked to describe the Russian artist's playing in one brief sentence, we should describe it as extremely neat and precise, almost dainty in its peculiar form of elegance, but more resembling the tapping of a delicate hammer than the Cyclopean thunder appropriate to Beethoven in a grand mood. M. de Pachmann, of course, appeared at his best in the finale, where light and sparkling passages abound. Here, indeed, he gave much satisfaction, and derived all the advantage possible from mutual fitness of style and theme. Regarded apart from the nature of the work in hand, the playing of the Russian pianist deserved admiration for excellent qualities. In the neatness and elegance already mentioned, in carefulness of phrasing, and in a certain frankness which never seeks to obscure risky passages by noise, it called up memories of the school wherein students were enjoined to treat the pianoforte as what it is rather than as a small orchestra. Bearing this in mind, amateurs will anticipate M. de Pachmann's promised recital with interest proportionate to the measure in which its programme is made up of works by composers who, like Chopin, wrote true pianoforte music. As the concerto was played without book, it was not surprising that the performer once missed his entry. Mendelssohn's advice to young players, "Get your piece by heart, but always have it on the desk," is obviously as sensible in these days of mnemonic prodigies as when first uttered. With Beethoven's work were associated Mendelssohn's "Scotch Symphony," the variations for two pianofortes on the march from Preciosa (by the same composer and his friend Moscheles), played by M. de Pachmann and Mr Ganz, and the overture to Der Freischütz. The vocalist was Mdme Rose Hersee, who sang with taste and feeling the air, "Once more has Heaven," from Rubinstein's Paradise Lost. Mr Ganz conducted as usual, and, at the close of his season, may be congratulated upon much spirit and enterprise.—D. T.

The combination-scheme between Herr Franke and Mr Carl Rosa, with Herr Richter as chief conductor, is virtually settled, and the details will shortly be made public.

Marianne Brandt.—One of the finest performances during the season of German Opera, Drury Lane, was that of Fidelio, on Wednesday night, in which Fräulein Brandt covered herself with laurels. A more interesting and enthusiastic Leonora could not well be imagined, or one more thoroughly appreciated by a highly intelligent audience.

FORM, OR DESIGN, IN VOCAL MUSIC.

The French vaudeville is a spoken drama with incidental music, frequently having little connection with the action of the drama. Sometimes popular tunes are adapted, instead of original compositions. Its origin, like that of the opéra comique, was in the infringement of the grand opera patent and in the device of making the audience sing while the actors played.

In Germany, though operas have been written in both the Italian style and the French grand opera style, the true German opera, called singspiel, has been written on the same plan as the French opéra comique, namely, as a musical drama in which the less lyric or more conversational parts are spoken. Schütz, in 1627, produced Dafne, an opera in German on the model of the Florentine school; but this was a solitary example of the kind, and about fifty years later the real German school began at Hamburg. The writers of these early operas were Theile (1678), Keiser (1694), and Handel, who produced his first opera, Almira, there in 1705. Of the same kind are the operas which Mozart wrote in German, Die Entführung aus dem Serail (1782), Die Zauberflöte, and others; Beethoven's Fidelio, Spohr's Faust and Azor und Zemira, Weber's Der Freyschütz, &c. Mozart's operas on the Italian model were written in the Italian language, and must not be considered examples of German opera. Spohr's Jessonda and Der Berggeist, and Weber's Euryanthe, written in German, were on the model of the French grand opera, (without the necessity of the ballet) and of the later Italian opera; namely, with accompanied recitative in place of spoken dialogue.

In England the first opera with continuous music was the Siege of Rhodes, the composition of five men, three of whom composed the vocal and two the instrumental music, with Sir William Davenant as manager or producer. This was in 1656, in the days of the Commonwealth, and preceded Cambert in France (1659), and Theile in Germany (1678). After the Restoration there were spoken plays, with incidental or episodical music, of which Purcell wrote King Arthur, The Tempest, and many others. Previously to writing these, Purcell had written Dido and Æneas, an opera in the Italian style, with music throughout, speaking recitative, accompanied recitative, airs, concerted and choral music. Subsequently Locke wrote Psyche, an opera in the same style. Then Addison wrote his Rosamond, and Clayton set it to music in the Italian style, and because of its ill-success Addison must needs find fault with opera, and with the English language as unmusical. Arne set the same Rosamond to music and also wrote Artaxerxes, and afterwards Olympia, with Italian words, all in the Italian style—the latter for the Italian opera-house then in London. Then came the ballad-operas, which, like the French vaudevilles, were spoken dramas with popular songs interspersed. After a while some ballad-operas were produced with music written specially for them. After these later ballad-operas, Bishop wrote many operas which were an improvement on them, with concerted music after the fashion of the earliest glees of Playford in Commonwealth times, which was incorporated in the action of the drama, and had more of the character of dialogue than had the music of the ballad-operas. By degrees the music of the dramas assumed more and more importance, though still it had very much of the character of episode. Weber wrote his Oberon for the English stage in this way; and in it, the music is so entirely episodical that the story is quite complete if all the parts set to music are taken out, and some of the characters do not sing at all.

In 1834, John Barnett produced his Mountain Sylph. This, like the French opéra comique and the German singspiel, has a partly spoken dialogue, but much of the action and the chief of the interest is set to music—recitative, airs, concerted pieces, and choruses. In similar form were Balfe's Siege of Rochelle (1835), Macfarren's Devil's Opera (1838), and Wallace's Maritana (1845). The first English opera in the style of the grand opera, i.e., with continuous accompanied recitative, airs, concerted music, and choruses, was Barnett's Fair Rosamond, produced in 1837. Then followed Balfe's Daughter of St Mark (1844), and Macfarren's Helvellyn (1864.) Other operas of both kinds, both with and without spoken dialogue, have been written by the above composers, but it is sufficient to name the initial works of each.

It must be noticed that when English, French, and German operas are performed at the Italian houses in London, the spoken dialogue is set to recitative either by the composer or some other musician.

Music for comedy, or more strictly speaking, burlesque, has not been wanting in England. The Dragon of Wantley, a burlesque opera, was produced towards the end of the last century, and was a composition with continuous music. Midas, produced about the same time, had recitative throughout written by Dr Arne, with some popular songs interspersed, and at least one song composed for it. This was burlesque of the broadest description. One or two singers were among the actors, and the rest, not being singers, sang what they imagined to be recitative, and the accompaniment came in where it best could. Jove was called Lord Mayor of the Sky. Midas was dressed in costume of the period at which the piece was brought out, his wife was called Mrs Midas, and addressed with "Pray, goody, please to moderate the rancour of your tongue"—the song written for it by Dr Burney. Midas was popular even as late as about 1820 or 1830.

Of late years burlesque operas have been written, for English as well as for continental stages, more in the style of the opera comique, that is to say, with spoken dialogue; but the music has generally been of the slightest description possible.

PIP I.

But the undoubted success of the German Opera Season is Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg, by Richard Wagner. Here Richard is himself again, which he is not in the Nibelung's Ring, where he loses himself in the dusk of the Gods, goes to the depths of Paganism for an objectionable plot, and shows a group of characters actuated, dramatically, by the lowest motives, and, musically, by all sorts of mixed motives, of which some are good, some bad, and many indifferent. But Die Meistersinger, or—as the second title might be—A Cobbler there was, &c.—(the stalls were all filled in compliment to the Cobbler)—is charming throughout. A simple and sufficiently interesting story illustrated by thoughtful, mirthful, and delightful melody, which is never wearisome from first to last—and it is a long Opera. There are in it several complete choruses, a choral, two or three distinct songs with real live tunes to them, and a finished quintet which would have been vociferously encored had Herr Richter permitted it. The acting is excellent, especially the part of chief mastersinger, Hans Sachs, by Herr Gura. The genuine comic acting of Herr Ehrke was admirable, and Fraülein Malten looked and sang charmingly. No one fond of melodious Opera, and no unbeliever in Wagner, should miss seeing his Meistersinger.

PIP II.

At the Mansion House Banquet last Saturday, given in the interests of the Royal College of Music—which evidently can't get on without a lot of feeding—the Lord Mayor must have had cruel hard work to cram himself, before dinner, with his quotations from Shakspere, Ben Jonson, and Wordsworth. The first of these was fairly appropriate in a lumbering, commonplace way; the second was slightly satirical; and the third, applied to the Princess of Wales, suggested that Her Royal Highness was "Bright With something of the Angel Light," which may or may not be complimentary, according to the appreciable difference between an Angel of Light and a Light Angel. But the intention was good. Brayvo, Sir Witty-dog Ellis, Bart.! Whittington would have been proud of you.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—Though no absolute novelty, up to this moment, has been presented, Mr Gye, thanks to his strong company of prima donnas, is able to vary his programmes in a manner that cannot fail to satisfy subscribers in particular and the operatic public generally. Following almost directly upon the Sonnambula, with Mdme Sembrich as Amina, came Gounod's Faust e Margherita, Mdme Pauline Lucca playing the heroine—in a dramatic sense more especially a very remarkable impersonation, and the more welcome after an interval of ten years. Retaining its primitive grace and charm, Mdme Lucca's Margherita has, if possible, gained in force and intensity, of which the last and most tragic scenes may be cited as examples. A line may suffice to record that Dinorah and Don Giovanni, with Mdme Patti as "the one serene and unapproached star" in both masterpieces—for masterpieces they are, each in its different sphere, longo intervallo as it may be—were listened to with all the old, and as years roll on, still undiminished satisfaction. In Mozart's opera the important character of Donna Anna was sustained with signal ability by Mdme Fürsch-Madi, and that of Elvira by Mdme Valleria, one of the best representatives of the part that could now be named. Signor Cotogni was the Don Giovanni whom of late years we have been accustomed to recognize, and M. Gailhard, a Leporello with whom inevitable custom has made us familiar. To the foregoing must be added, with a bare record of their occurrence, I Puritani, as the heroine of which once so popular work Mdme Albani is acknowledged legitimate successor to Angiolina Bosio, and Rossini's gorgeous Semiramide, with the newest, and in many respects the worthiest representative of the proud and guilty Babylonian Queen, in Mdme Adelina Patti, all doubts as to whose fitness to give sufficient dignity to the part (about her capacity to do justice to the music there could never have been a question) were dispelled when, some two years since, she first essayed it. In Mdlle Tremelli Mdme Patti found a congenial Arsace, with a genuine contralto voice, such as Rossini must have contemplated when writing the music, and in M. Gailhard about as competent a French Assur as could be looked for. That Le Nozze di Figaro, with Mdme Albani as Countess Almaviva, Mdme Lucca as Cherubino, and Mdme Valleria as Susanna, should have brought a crowded audience, the most crowded, perhaps, of the season, is by no means surprising. Mozart's inimitable comic opera, in which humour and sentiment are so naturally combined, with three such lucida sidera to represent the principal female characters, could not fail to attract; and so with the well-known Figaro of Signor Cotogni, and a sufficiently acceptable Count in M. Dufriche, the performance was enjoyable from beginning to end. Among the conspicuous vocal effects of the evening were the aria, "Dove sono," of Mdme Albani, and the "Voi che sapete," of Mdme Lucca—the most sprightly and vivacious of imaginable pages. The last was encored and repeated, as was the duet, "Sull' aria," between the Countess and Susanna, in which the voices of Mdmes Albani and Valleria blended exquisitely. The performance was generally excellent. It may suffice to add that Meyerbeer's Prophète was given for the first time on Tuesday, with Mdme Stahl as Fides, Mdme Valleria as Bertha, and M. Sylva as John of Leyden—a part, to speak truly, hardly within his means, either vocally or dramatically. Fra Diavolo was given on Thursday, with Mdme Lucca in her favourite character of Zerlina, and the new tenor, M. Lestellier, as the Brigand Chief. About this performance we must speak in our next. Meanwhile, the season rapidly draws to a close.—Graphic.

About two o'clock on Sunday morning, June 18, at Liverpool, an alarm was raised that the Royal Court Theatre was on fire. Several engines and a staff of firemen were soon on the spot, and, through their aid, with great exertion, the flames were confined to the stage, which, with the machinery, was almost entirely consumed. The Royal Court, a new theatre, was re-built near the end of last year.

A century ago Paris possessed only six theatres, the number in 1782 being limited to the Opera, the Comédie Française, the Théâtre des Grands Danseurs du Roi, the Comédie Italienne, the Ambigu, and the Variétés. Now there are nearly thirty important theatres in the French capital, without counting the minor houses in the out-of-the-way suburbs or the 140 café-concerts. A new kind of scenery is being tried in the Prussian theatres with a view to decrease the danger of fire. Instead of canvas, sheet-tin is used for the scenery, and the latter material is not only fireproof, but cheaper and more durable.

THREE STARS.*

There are three stars that ever shine
So brightly and so clear,
They shed o'er all a light divine,
Life's rugged path to cheer.

The first is Faith, a glorious star
That, with its radiance bright,
Fills old and young, both near and far,
With an undying light.

The next is Hope, whose brightest rays
Are seen 'midst grief and pain,
Assuring us that happier days
Will soon return again.

With Faith and Hope, the Star of Love,
To all on earth is giv'n,
By Him who rules us from above,
To draw us near to Heav'n.

"Messrs Boosey & Co. have done good service not only to amateurs but to art, by including in their series of volumes of national melodies 'The Songs of Scandinavia' and 'The Songs of Eastern Europe.' The first-named contains eighty-three examples; and the second, a hundred. We need not insist upon the importance of collections like these, whatever the country they represent; but we must say that no musical library is complete without the songs of Scandinavia and Eastern Europe. The editor, Mr J. A. Kappey, has taken great pains to secure melodies of a genuinely representative character, and at a time when attention is becoming more and more directed to folk-tunes as a source of new thematic ideas, the volumes in question are of peculiar value. They have our most hearty commendation, the 'Songs of Eastern Europe' more especially, since the volume contains, besides examples of Liszt, Chopin, and other masters, a very valuable collection of volkslieder from the hitherto untouched wealth of the Austrian provinces."—Daily Telegraph.

"Messrs Boosey & Co. have published two additional volumes of their National Songs, which appear likely to be the most interesting of the series. We know little of the rich repertory of Scandinavian Songs, and Mr and Miss Kappey, the editors of these books, are to be thanked for introducing some of the best specimens to public notice. Five of the Russian songs are so old as to be traditional; and in the series are to be found a beautiful Cossack lullaby by one Bachmetieff, a gipsy song by Lvoff, and several songs by Warlamoff. These and the Polish songs (all of which are traditional) may be considered among the most interesting items of a small but acceptable collection. Two ancient Lithuanian songs, a couple of Finnish, and four ancient Norwegian melodies, will likewise be found in the book. The majority of the Swedish songs are by Lindblad, that prolific song writer, who died in 1864. Tradition says that the old melody of 'The Beggar Boy' was once sung in the days when she was a poor child by the distinguished artist now known as Mdme Christine Nilsson. Included in the Danish songs is the traditional 'Dannebrog,' the music of which is attributed to one 'Bay.' It would be interesting to inquire the foundation for this statement, as the origin of the Danish National Anthem was generally understood to be unknown. The tradition of the 'Dannebrog Banner,' which, in 1719, fell down from heaven to bring victory to the Danish arms, is duly recorded in a footnote. Most of the Dutch songs given date back to the sixteenth century; and there are besides three songs by W. F. G. Nicolai, and one Flemish song. Altogether eighty-three of the national songs of northern Europe are included in this valuable and interesting book. In future editions a larger preface or more footnotes, giving further particulars of the old songs whose history is known, would be welcome. Equally interesting are the songs of Eastern Europe, recently issued by Messrs Boosey, and likewise edited by Mr and Miss Kappey. Among the thirty-four Austrian songs, the large majority are volkslieder, and they include Tyrolean, Styrian, and Polish songs, two of them by Chopin. These are followed by twenty-three characteristic specimens of Hungarian songs, giving a very fair idea of the peculiarities of Hungarian music, and comprising modern songs by Liszt, and some traditional songs of Bosnia, Moravia, and Dalmatia. The first of the Bohemian songs is the 'War-song of the Hussites,' once, it is believed, the national song of the country. A few specimens of Servian, Swiss, Greek, and even Turkish melodies. The last are very peculiar; and the peculiar intervals common to this and other Eastern music are claimed by some to have been handed down direct from the music of the ancient Hebrews."—Figaro.

"Miss Albrecht is not only a pianist of remarkable power and ability but a composer of very elegant music for her 'instrument de prédilection.' This spirited 'Martial Fantasia,' in G major, boldly asserts its title, and is indeed a stirring effusion, that might be made effective, in score, for a military band. The piece is no child's play, but will require study. The staccato octave passages alone supply work for fire-eating players."—"Musical Standard," May, 1882.

TRISTAN UND ISOLDE.

Audi alteram partem.

Wagner's Tristan und Isolde, heard for the first time in England at Drury Lane on Tuesday night, brings to a close the performances of that master's entire works, from Rienzi to the Götterdämmerung, which have been given in London in the course of one season—a feat, by the way, which, we believe, is unprecedented even in Germany. That this opera should have been the last in order of production is appropriate in more than one respect. For not only does it show Wagner's style of music in its maturest stage, but it is by many competent persons believed to be his opus magnum, the standard, indeed, by which the artistic value of his work will finally be judged. Leaving the question of absolute and of relative merit for the present undecided, we may safely say that no other work of Wagner is so thoroughly his own and so entirely unlike what any other composer has ever done or is likely to do. The unity of feeling and expression, the continuity of unremitting passion here displayed, are probably unprecedented in the history of music. It has been said that the musical structure of Lohengrin is virtually founded upon the alternation of the A major and F sharp minor chords. Infinitely more true is it that Tristan und Isolde is consistently evolved from that wonderful love-motive which appears in the overture, and, with its congeners and various developments, never leaves hold of the hearer from the first bar to the last. There is, indeed, nothing to divert the attention from the central idea of the action thus translated into music. The incidents of the story are of the simplest kind; there are no scenic effects to speak of; of the three scenes presented the first takes place on the deck of a ship, the second in an arbour, the third in the courtyard of a castle; a male chorus is employed in the first act only. Everything, in short, depends upon the brief joys and acute sufferings of the ill-fated couple, which are set forth in a series of pictures full of subtle psychological design and sombre colour. Perhaps nowhere else has Wagner shown greater boldness than in the continued strain of passion which he sustains throughout this opera. Nowhere, also, are his demands on the physical and mental faculties of his interpreters more exacting. The representatives of Tristan and Isolde—for the other characters are comparatively subordinate—must be not only singers of exceptional voice-power, but also actors of the highest order. They scarcely ever leave the stage, and while there they are not for a moment unemployed. They are always the centre of the action, and even when they keep silence their by-play and attitudes should be full of significance.

With the main incidents of Wagner's drama most of our readers are acquainted. The story of Tristan and Isolde has been a favourite one with English poets, ancient and modern. Sir Walter Scott has edited from a manuscript in the Advocate's Library at Edinburgh the lay of "Sir Tristrem," which he erroneously attributes to Thomas of Ercildoune. Mr Tennyson and Mr Swinburne (in his forthcoming volume) have, each in his own individual fashion, treated the story of the lovers. In mediæval times that story ranked in popularity with the parallel incident from the Arthurian circle—the love of Lancelot and Guinivere. Derived originally from Celtic sources, it belonged to that great wave of mythical lore which continually kept crossing and re-crossing the Channel from the Welshman to the Franco-Norman, and back again to the Saxon and Anglo-Norman, leaving its flotsam in the literatures of most European nations. The names of some of the greatest poets of mediæval France, Christien de Troyes and Marie de France among the number, are intimately connected with the development of the story. Trouvères and troubadours continually allude to it, and we could quote Provençal and French versions of the identical "Lai don chievrefriel" which Tristan was supposed to have addressed to the beautiful wife of his uncle. Dante also is familiar with "Tristano di Cornovaglia," who with Francesca and Paolo, Semiramide, Paris, and other famous lovers appears in the fifth canto of the "Inferno." But by far the most beautiful and most comprehensive mediæval treatment the story received at the hands of a German poet, Master Gottfried von Strassburg, on whose work Wagner's drama is more immediately based. That Gottfried's poem is drawn from English and French sources there is external and internal evidence. He himself mentions a "Thomas von Britanje" as one of the authors he had studied, and is fond of quoting a lovely French couplet,— > "Isot ma drue, Isot ma mie, > En vus ma mort, en vus ma vie,"

which one is almost sorry that Wagner has allowed to escape him. But, in spite of this, there are in Gottfried's poems features, such as the beautiful description of the lovers' life in the forest, which none but himself could have written. A parallel between the treatment of the same story by the mediæval and the modern German poet would lead to interesting results. The differences are, in the first instance, accounted for by the exigencies of epic and dramatic poetry. The episode of Riwalin and Blancheflour and the early youth of Tristan Wagner justly ignores, and a second "Isolde aux blanches mains," who plays a conspicuous part in the epic, likewise remains unmentioned. But apart from these necessary excisions, the spirit in which he approaches the subject is very different from that of his predecessor. Gottfried von Strassburg looks upon his subject with the delight of a conteur. The love of the pair strikes him merely from its picturesque side; to their guilt he is all but blind. His poem being left unfinished, we cannot, of course, tell whether, after having adorned the tale, he intended to point a moral. But so far as it goes, that tale, if not exactly immoral, is at least totally un-moral. With the deeper consciousness of the modern poet this conception did not tally. As in all Wagner's dramas, the guilt of Tristan and Isolde is immediately followed by punishment and repentance bitterer than all outward punishment could be. A sadder pair of lovers has, indeed, never been presented on the stage. Their passion is not happiness; it comes to them like a decree of fate, against which they vainly struggle, and which leads them to death. This idea of fate is represented by the love-potion which the pair drink in accordance with the old story. Of the mythical element thus introduced one might say what Carlyle says of the supernatural agencies in Goethe's Faust: "The poet retains the supernatural vesture of the story, but retains it with the consciousness on his and our part that it is a chimera; nowise a real Object, but a real Shadow of an Object which is also real, yet lies beyond our horizon, and, except in its shadow, cannot itself be seen." In other words, the love-potion is merely the symbol of that passion which, as the Psalmist says, is "strong as death" and knows of no fetter.

With Wagner musical and poetical inspiration always spring from the same source, and we find, therefore, that the idea of the love-potion is identified with that leading melody, from which, as we said before, the entire structure of the score is organically evolved. To give an idea of the structure in ordinary critical prose would be next to impossible. The absolute unity of the design will not allow us even to point to detached features of beauty or interest. Everything, from the sailor's song, heard from the masthead as the curtain rises, to the death-scene of Isolde, frequently sung at concerts, and appreciated, although not fully realized, even there—is closely knitted together. There are no arias or ensembles or finales in the ordinary sense. The wonderful love-scene, which fills almost the entire second act, cannot, for example, be called a duet in the technical sense. The music here follows the converse of the lovers in its subtlest changes, rising and falling with the undulations of their feeling. There is here nothing but melody, but there are no tunes. The meaning of this difference will be apparent if the reader will compare the motive intoned to the words "Oh sink' hernieder Nacht" with Wagner's song, "Dreams," published separately as a "study to Tristan." By that means insight will be gained into Wagner's method of wedding his melodic materials into an organic whole. Towards the end of the duet Brangane's voice warning the lovers is heard from the tower where she is keeping guard. Wagner here has used the idea of the "Watcher's song" found in the Provençal alba and in the German Wächterlieder. But again this idea is in absolute accordance with the dramatic situation. The truly dramatic account to which the Leitmotive, or representative themes (fortunately not as yet labelled with fictitious names by a German pedant) are turned may be illustrated by at least one instance. When King Mark asks Tristan for the hidden cause which could have induced the faithful knight to betray his trust, no answer is forthcoming from the hero. But that answer is supplied by the orchestra intoning the theme identified with the love-potion. Faith has yielded to resistless passion. Such are a few features of a score in which musicians recognize one of the most concentrated and sustained efforts of their art. To give an idea of the dramatic structure of Wagner's work it will suffice to say that the first act takes place on board the vessel which carries the unwilling Irish bride to King Mark. Despair and love's disappointment drive Isolde to the resolution of destroying her own life together with that of Tristan, who has killed her kinsman Moralt, but whom she loves in her own despite. Tristan is asked to drain with her the cup of atonement, but without Isolde's knowledge the prepared poisonous draught is exchanged by the faithful Brangane for the love-potion. The second act shows the secret meeting of the lovers and their betrayal by Melot, Tristan's faithless friend. Tristan, crushed by the gentle reproach of his benefactor, makes a feigned attack on Melot, and is pierced by his sword. Taken to his castle in Brittany by his retainer Kurvenal, the hero in the third act dies at the moment when Isolde arrives with a message of forgiveness and hope. Isolde expires on the body of her lover. Whether a drama treating of unrelieved tragic passion in a style of commensurate severity will ever gain the popularity of such works as Lohengrin or Die Meistersinger must appear doubtful; but the value of a work of art cannot be measured by the degree of popular favour it is likely to find.—Times.

CHESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

Chester, June 10.

There was again a very large attendance at the cathedral this morning, and a more attractive programme could hardly have been offered. The success of the festival will doubtless encourage all who are interested in the cultivation of music. Those who have no experience of such enterprises can have little idea of the labour involved in bringing them to a prosperous issue. At Chester there is no permanent body of organisers, with tradition to guide them, such as the managing committee of the Three Choirs Festivals possess, and a scheme of the kind could not be attempted without serious risk. But the Dean, enlightened and sympathetic, evidently believes that religion can only gain by calling in music to its aid; the Precentor, too, the Rev. C. H. Hylton Stewart, hon. secretary of the committee, has been unsparing of his energy; while in Mr Joseph C. Bridge, cathedral organist, he has found a devoted colleague, and the success of their united efforts gives reason to hope that the Chester Festival may become triennial.

The oratorios in the Cathedral to-day were Haydn's Creation, and Sterndale Bennett's Woman of Samaria. The Messiah seems to be no longer indispensable at an English festival, and if Yorkshire has dared three times to abandon the most popular of oratorios, Chester may be forgiven for following the example, especially as Haydn's favourite work was given instead. "I intend this to live," said the composer, when asked why he devoted so much time and care to its composition; and one is conscious of unabated freshness and beauty in listening to it for the hundredth time. I cannot say I never heard a finer performance of The Creation, but a more interesting one could not have been desired; the choralists were familiar with the music, and the experience of the two previous days had been useful to them and all concerned. Manchester amateurs were now and then inevitably reminded that all the members of the band did not belong to Mr Hallé's orchestra; but very few shortcomings were noted in the picturesque accompaniments. The solemnity of the Representation of Chaos, indeed, was intensified by the surroundings, and the leading instrumentalists were all equal to their tasks. I might mention examples of really fine choral singing in this performance of The Creation—and in nothing else have the choralists more creditably distinguished themselves than in "The heavens are telling," "Achieved is the glorious work," and "The Lord is great." The solo parts were taken by Mdme Marie Roze, Messrs Maas and Hilton. Mdme Marie Roze cannot be expected to rival the achievements of Jenny Lind, Clara Novello, or Therèse Tietjens; but in "With verdure clad," and "On mighty pens," the beauty of her voice, and her brilliant execution, were heard to great advantage. How Mr Maas sings the tenor music your readers do not require to be told; his superb voice told with admirable effect, and his reading of "In native worth" was a model of refinement. Mr Hilton, too, who had carefully studied the music, did excellent service. This gentleman's voice is a genuine bass, and his sonorous low notes were not superfluous. In consequence of the length of the programme, the duets, "Of stars the fairest," and "Graceful consort," were omitted.

In some respects, The Woman of Samaria was the most interesting performance of the week, and its introduction was all the more welcome as the opportunities of hearing it are so rare. Why this is so it is not easy to say; that it should not be, all who appreciate what is great in English art will admit. For in this oratorio we have the product of the maturity of England's most eminent composer, one who has achieved much; whose symphonies, cantatas, concertos, and songs rank with the works of the genuine masters, and who never once sacrificed the dignity of his art by writing a commonplace bar. The subject of The Woman of Samaria may not have been fortunate, inasmuch as it affords little opportunity for dramatic treatment; but in no work of the kind are learning and scholarship more admirably directed to the illustration of religious aspiration, tender pathos, and devotion. The choruses, "Therefore with joy shall ye draw water," "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel," and "Therefore shall they come," could only have been written by a great musician; the solos are models of dignified sacred song, and the quartet, "God is a Spirit," is too well known to need more than mention. The orchestration, too, is worthy of the composer of the Wood Nymphs overture. Sterndale Bennett, indeed, was not only a master of orchestral resource, but a most artistic musical colourist; he never exaggerates, moreover, and the art of this beautiful work is really perfect. There might have been an earnest disposition to do justice to the final performance of the Chester Festival, and assuredly the result was most gratifying, high praise being due to Mr Bridge, the conductor. The band and chorus were again at their best, and with such singers as Miss Mary Davies, Mdme Patey, Mr Guy, and Mr King, the songs were of course efficiently rendered. Miss Mary Davies once more proved her ability to do justice to exacting demands. Her fine voice was, as usual, under perfect control, and she was equally effective in the trying air, "Art thou greater," as in the not less important recitatives. Those who had the good fortune to hear Mdme Patey give the pathetic air, "O Lord, Thou hast searched me out," will not soon forget this superb display of vocal art. Mr Guy sang the tenor music with real taste, the fine quality of his voice being not less apparent in the concerted than in the solo music; while Mr F. King, whose singing has been so justly admired, fully sustained the favourable opinion already elicited. The singing of an unaccompanied quartet is often a painful ordeal at a great festival, even when the duty is entrusted to eminent vocalists, but the most fastidious could ask for nothing more exquisite than the rendering of "God is a Spirit" by Miss Davies, Mdme Patey, Mr Guy, and Mr King. Nothing, perhaps, during the festival created a deeper impression; the rapt attention of the great audience was remarkable, and at the end there was a murmur of sympathetic appreciation which could not fail to gratify the executants. It is to be hoped that the "marked success" of the performance of this beautiful work may encourage other committees to follow the example of the managers at Chester.

A ballad concert was given to-night at the Music Hall; but to make it worthy the occasion, "string quartets" by Schubert and Beethoven were introduced; and with such interpreters as MM. Straus, Jacoby, Otto Bernhardt, and Vieuxtemps, the Chester amateurs had reason to deem themselves fortunate. Nearly all the leading singers took part in the concert. E. J. B.

LONDON ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The professional students of the London Academy of Music gave their annual summer concert at St James's Hall on Saturday afternoon, June 24, when a large number of talented, promising young vocalists and instrumentalists took part. The concert opened with Mendelssohn's Chorus, "Praise ye the Lord," solos by Mdlles Masset, Letherbarrow, and Elstob. This was followed by a "Rondo Brillante" (Mendelssohn), well played by Miss Elsie Evans; an aria, artistically rendered by Mr Noyes; and Beethoven's adagio and rondo, from his Concerto in G, performed by Miss Kate Griffiths with remarkable skill and ability. Miss Carreras sang with purity of tone and pleasing effect Mendelssohn's "Infelice;" Miss O. Josephs rendered Bellini's "Ah, non credea" in good Italian style, and Miss F. Smith won deserved plaudits in Mercadante's aria, "Se m'abbandoni." Miss Rose Moss in "Batti, batti," Miss Luke and Miss White in a trio by Rossini, Miss Martin in a cavatina of Meyerbeer's, Mr Reakes in an excellent rendering of an air from L'Etoile du Nord, and Miss Browne in the contralto solos of Rubinstein's Die Nixe, also proved their skill and ability as pleasing and well-cultured vocalists. Two of the marked features of the concert were—the violin solo of Miss Kate Chaplin, who gave an admirable rendering of the Finale in one of De Beriot's concertos, and the violin playing of Mr Skuze, a performer who, in regard to age, might with propriety have been announced as "Master Skuze." This young executant played the first movement of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto in a style and with an amount of skill so marked, as to excite the liveliest hopes of future fame under the tuition of his esteemed master, Herr Pollitzer. Mr Newman also rendered a solo of De Beriot's with skill and effect. Miss Nellie Chaplin gave a really brilliant performance of Liszt's "Fantaisie Hongroise," and Miss Louis, Miss Titmas, and Miss Anstie gave pianoforte selections from Chopin with brilliancy, skill, fine touch, and taste. The stars of the occasion, besides Miss Nellie Chaplin, were Miss Florence Waud, who played the first movement of Schumann's A minor Concerto, and Miss Maggie Okey, who rendered the andante and rondo of Chopin's E minor. Both these clever pianists played with their accustomed skill and excellence, and both, it may be remembered, have already won high honours in public. The concert was conducted by the Principal of the institution, Professor Wylde, Mus.D.—The Echo.

The Order of the Italian Crown has been conferred on Massenet and Landozzi, while Felice Lebano has received from Madrid the Cross of Isabella the Catholic and, from Lisbon, that of St Jago.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

A concert was given by the students of this institution in St James's Hall, on Wednesday afternoon, with marked success, the room being crowded, and the various performances deserving all the applause bestowed upon them. Brilliant talent is, unfortunately, rare among native aspirants to musical honours, nor can anything be conceived more depressing than the experience, year after year, of mediocrity hopeless of ever rising beyond itself. The proceedings were encouraging. There seemed just a possibility that a few of those who took part in them would come out of the "ruck," and obtain from their art something more than the living which, under the strain of modern life, is often the be-all and end-all of ambition. The "program"—as the dictionary of the establishment, with a leaning towards a reformed orthography, spells programme—contained several works of an important character, written by students. Among these were a "Pastoral" overture in A, composed by Mr John Cullen; an overture in E major, from the pen of Mr G. E. West; and a "Credo," in which Mr G. J. Bennett essayed one of the most formidable tasks imposed by ritual upon a Church musician. Mr Bennett—we resist the temptation of his youth to call him Master—had on several previous occasions made a very favourable impression with works of an ambitious nature. The fact may not, however, have excited more than passing remark. We are accustomed to the dramatic surprises of musical juvenility, and equally familiar with the evanescence of the hopes it calls forth. Mr Bennett promises an exception to the usual rule. He holds on; more, he takes a firmer grip with each succeeding year, and encourages us to anticipate a time when he will fill some such place as that once occupied by his distinguished namesake, part of whose beautiful concerto in F minor was in Wednesday's programme. The new "Credo" is a work of very high promise, showing not only rare command of technical resources, but a strength of imagination and a power of expression not usually associated with pupils in their "teens." We do not, of course, enter into detailed criticism. That will be the right of Mr Bennett's works by-and-bye. Meanwhile let him persevere, remaining unspoilt by praise, undeterred by discouragement, a brave and modest candidate for the prize between which and him lies, at present, a long and weary way, Another important novelty was a pianoforte concerto in E, by Mr F. B. Jewson, one of the earliest students of the Academy, and now one of its most respected professors. Mr Jewson received his training at a time when the art of pianoforte playing flourished in its purity, untroubled by "higher development." It may be assumed, therefore, that his concerto contains genuine pianoforte music, and this is the case. Modelled on the good old lines, yet not without something of the grace and freedom of modern ideas, it is eminently what it pretends to be, and very grateful to the performer withal. The opening movement contains some admirable passages, but the interest is cumulative, and rises through the andante con moto to a climax in the really piquant and attractive finale. We congratulate Mr Jewson upon this thoughtful utterance at a time when hysteria and convulsions seem to be fashionable. The solo was played by Miss Dinah Shapley, to whom the work is dedicated, and so played as to command general approval of the performer's talent. Among other features of the concert were an excellent rendering of the romance and allegro assai from Mozart's concerto in D minor, by Miss Beatrice Davenport, the singing, by Miss Thudichum—who has a capital voice and method, but wants animation—of "Come per me sereno," Mr L. Williams's spirited and artistic delivery of "Nasce al bosco," and a really able performance, by Mr Frank Arnold, of an andante and scherzo by Ferdinand David. The orchestra, as usual, was conducted by Mr Shakespeare.—D. T.

COBURG.—The report that the Duke was prepared to have a regular operatic company again at the Ducal Theatre, at least from October to March, provided the Municipality continued the grant of 5,000 marks of last year to the company from Nuremberg, and that the Municipality had consented, was erroneous, the Municipality declining the proposal.

MUSIC AT THE ANTIPODES.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The Montague-Turner Company continues its performance of opera in English at the Bijou Theatre. Miss Annie Montague and Mr Charles Turner have been applauded in every part they have essayed. The theatre is almost always crowded, and, frequently, numbers are refused admission. The operas already produced are The Bohemian Girl, Maritana, Lucia di Lammermoor, Il Trovatore, and Faust. The Rose of Castile is announced for this evening, Martha, Lucrezia Borgia, Fra Diavolo, and Mignon being in preparation, the company remaining for five weeks more, making eleven in all. The other leading artists are Misses Williams, J. Deakin, Maud Walton, and Vanosta, Messrs C. Templeton, B. Levison, Percy Shannon, J. Gordon, and Gainor, the last named, a baritone, making a successful début as Valentine in Faust. M. Léon Caron conducts the orchestra, and Signor de Vivo is business director.

Mr Martin Simonsen has formed a new opera company for the chief cities of Australasia, the members being Mdme Simonsen, Misses Martina, Leonora and Fanny Simonsen, Signor Paladini, Messrs Albert Brennir, and E. St Clair. They open shortly in Sydney.

Maritana has been given by the Hawthorn and Kew Harmonic Society in the Town Hall, Hawthorn, near Melbourne. The solo singers were Mrs Emery Gould (soprano), Miss Blanche Fuller (contralto), Messrs G. Smith, W. Sincock, and C. Kirkland—Mr H. Curtis leading, and Mr W. Turner conducting the orchestra.

Antonio Giammona's "Mass," recently composed for SS. Peter and Paul's Church, Emerald Hill, near Melbourne, was reproduced on Sunday, the 7th inst. Mr M. O'Gorman presided at the organ for the last time. Mr O'Gorman, organist in the church of SS. Peter and Paul for twenty years, is about to remove to Sydney. M. Leon Caron conducted the performance of the "Mass."

Wilhelmj, the great violinist, gave a "testimonial concert," on the evening of the 6th, in the Melbourne Town Hall, his associates being Mdme Gabriella Boema, Miss Marie Conron, and the Metropolitan and Melbourne Liedertafels (under Julius Herz). The orchestra, alternately directed by MM. Steffani and Vogrich, was led by Mr George Weston.

The Education Department have commissioned Mr J. Summers, teacher of music in the State schools, to have Tennyson's "Hands all round" sung by 5,000 children in the Exhibition Building on the Queen's birthday.

On the 5th inst., a new organ, built by W. Stone, of West Beach, St. Kilda, near Melbourne, was opened in the Presbyterian Church, Clarendon Street, Emerald Hill. The instrument is described as follows:—

Compass of manuals, two, CC to A, 58 keys; pedals, CCC to F, 30 keys. Great organ contains: open diapason, stopped diapason, and dulciana, all of 8 ft.; principal and flute of 4 ft.; twelfth 3 ft.; and fifteenth 2 ft. Swell organ—violin diapason, lieblich gedact, and hautbois 8 ft; gegen principal 4 ft.; piccolo 2 ft.; pedal organ—open diapason 16 ft.; octave 8 ft.

Mr J. Summers, organist of All Saints' Church, St Kilda, performed at the opening selections from Beethoven and Mozart. A vocal concert was also given by the choir of the church, Mr Summers presiding at the organ and Mr Johnston conducting.

A concert in aid of the persecuted Jews in Southern Russia is to be given in the Melbourne Town Hall on the 13th inst. A large number of musicians well-known in Melbourne are to assist.

ST PETERSBURGH (Correspondence).—The plan for the re-organization of Russian opera comprises an increase in chorus and orchestra, with raising of salaries. The chorus will in future number 120, the orchestra at least 100 members. The salary-list for the present chorus of 88 members, 28,000 roubles a year, will be 88,000, so that a first class member of the chorus, hitherto in receipt of 30 roubles a month, will now draw 75. The chorus-singers, also, will be more liberally remunerated. For scenery, machinery, costumes, properties, &c., the estimated amount is one million roubles, 48,000 being set apart for weapons alone. Glinka's Life for the Czaar, with a new mise-en-scène, will inaugurate the next season, to be followed by Robert le Diable, Il Barbiere, Le Domino Noir, and F. David's Lalla Roukh. And this is Russian national opera!

FORM, OR DESIGN, IN VOCAL MUSIC.

In all the different schools of opera the treatment of the more lyrical portions of the drama follows the same main principle, the principle that we have traced through all the succession of smaller works. An opera is constructed of movements of greater or less length, in balanced alternation of restfulness and changefulness of ideas, both musical and poetical, with tonal or key-form to strengthen the design. Like the alternate condensation and rarefaction of the air in sound-vibrations is the alternate succession of passages with few, long drawn-out ideas, and passages with many short ideas. Together with the period of long-continued verbal ideas is that of long-continued musical ideas and keys; and together with the period of oft-changing verbal ideas is that of oft-changing musical ideas and keys.

In some recent operas certain characteristic expressions serve as helps to the comprehension of the whole, and by their repetition in pertinent situations they light the interest on from one point to another, as do the lamps in a street; but, like those lamps, they do not make the form.

In Fidelio we shall find the best example of all we want to show. We know well the story of the wife, Leonora, who, by her persistent devotion, saved her husband from the treachery of his enemy; and we will try to trace the steps by which Beethoven has, in the plan of that opera, illustrated and strengthened the ideas of the story by his music.

Gluck said that the overture ought to indicate the subject and prepare the spectators for the character of the piece they are about to see. Later composers have made it a kind of argument, synopsis, or concise statement of what is to follow. In the overture which is called Leonora, No. 3, Beethoven has made a prelude which fulfils all these conditions. Of the four overtures which he wrote for the opera, we feel this to be the one in which he followed his own free and careful judgment. It is a recomposition of the earliest written one (which is called No. 2); and the two which were written subsequently (No. 1 and the No. 4 called Fidelio), were written, apparently both of them, in obedience to a request from other people for something that should be brighter and simpler.

Written in the true sonata design, the overture is, at the same time, a perfect work of idea, of poetry; and by the use of subjects from the most important parts of the coming drama (the true leit motiv), as well as by the general feeling, the composer suggests the line of thought which he wishes to produce in that which follows. The introduction to the overture is a true fantasia, which goes as far towards formlessness as is good; the ideas and keys are suggested, and no sooner do we begin to realise what a thought is than it loses itself in the next. So the expression of sternness fades into melancholy, and melancholy gives place to bright angel thoughts; these in turn are ousted by stormy revenge, which alternates with gentle pleading. The slow introduction is joined to the allegro by the half-close in C, which requires for confirmation the first chord of the quicker movement. Of the allegro we may say that, through the medium of its perfect and complete design, it tells a story, in no very vague language, of earnest striving, of strong determination, of patient waiting and anxiety, of painful tension of feeling joined to the brightness of hope, rising to a climax of joyous love.

These feelings are made more certain and clear in our minds when we realize that certain musical ideas in the overture are taken from particular situations in the opera. All doubt is removed as to the composer's meaning in the second thought of the introduction when we find it afterwards used in a complete form as Florestan's solo in the dungeon, and joined to words of lament that happiness is fled from him in the springtime of his life. So, again, in the most exciting place in the overture, when our feelings have been worked up to a climax, there is a sudden interruption and a trumpet call rings out from behind the orchestra.

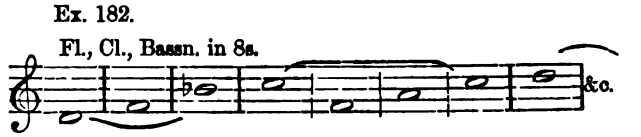
Ex. 182.



The meaning of this we cannot doubt when we come to the prison scene late in the opera. Here, after Leonora's long watching and anxiety, after digging the grave, after her discovery that the starving prisoner is really her husband, after watching Pizarro approach him, after protecting her husband with her own body, and, finally, with the drawn pistol, from Pizarro's uplifted dagger, then the same trumpet call outside seems to cry "Hold," and to beat off the murderer like a baffled dog. Then, too, the band gives forth the same song (see Ex. 182) telling of the relief and of the hope and thankfulness which streams into the hearts of Leonora and Florestan, and which they cannot express but in sobbing phrases, "Saved! Great is God!"

SCOTT AND SONTAG.

On one occasion we had the happiness of entertaining the famous Sontag at a large party at our own house. She was enchanting, as usual. Sir Walter Scott, who happened to be in London, was present. He was delighted at meeting Sontag, whose introduction to Sir Walter Scott on the eve of her appearing in the Donna del Lago, was singularly well-timed. In the presence of Sontag the great man was all ears, and eyes, too, I think. When she questioned him about her costume as the "Lady of the Lake," he described to her with the utmost minuteness every fold of the plaid, and was greatly pleased when I produced a genuine satin clan plaid, the present of Lady Sinclair while in Edinburgh, the loan of which I was delighted to promise to Sontag. He showed her the particular way the brooch should be fastened at the shoulder, and would not allow any alteration. Henrietta had two worshippers that evening, the second being Muzio Clementi, the pianist, who seemed as much fascinated as Scott. He got up from his chair, and said:—

"To-night I should like to play also." The proposition was received with acclamation. "He extemporized with all the freshness of youth," writes Moscheles, "and we listened with intense delight, for Clementi very rarely played before company." You should have seen the ecstasy of the two old men, Scott and Clementi; they shook each other by the hand, took it in turns to flirt with Sontag without seeming jealous of one another. It was a pretty duet of joint admiration: of course, the poet, musician, and songstress were the observed of all observers."

BRUSSELS.—(Correspondence)—The number of choristers at the Grand Musical Festival, on the 20th and 21st August, will be 400, the band comprising 110 performers. Among them will be most of the chefs de pupitre at the Conservatory Concerts. The programme includes Alexander's Feast, Handel (Victor Wilder's translation); Requiem, Johannes Brahms; "Le Retour," for choir, Ad. Samuel; "Hymne á la Beauté," (unpublished), P. Benoît, Flemish words by Hiel; Overture, Th. Radoux; overture to Iphigénie en Aulide, Gluck; and "Ave, verum," Mozart. The leading artists are Mad. Schroeder-Hanfstaengel; Bosquin, of the Paris Opera; Belhomme, of the Paris Opéra-Comique; and César Thompson, a Belgian violinist, pupil of Vieuxtemps.

L'alta Donna del Lago i membri e il cuore,

Ed ei mostra tal senno, e tal valore,
Che veste l'armi ancora giovanetto,

Ad infiammare a questo e a quella il petto;
Van per consiglio dalla Donna, e in via

This, my Francis, is the Eichel (thou knowest full well the Eiche), which, as it were, in Nymian speech, is "the humour of it." Hum, for example, this tune:—

—and then, after the manner of Antar the Absian, author of one of the seven poems of the Moallakat, suspended in the holy sanctuary encompassing the Kaaba, swear by the two eyes of Ibla, and set Rostam the wrestler at nought; it will hardly displease Chosroe.

FROM QUIGG OF CHICAGO.

Chicago, May 27, 1882.

Fizz! Bang!! Boom!!! and the Chicago annex of the Thomas travelling festival combination is gone. The question is now in order, what benefit it has been to art, or, to come down to a lower plane, to Chicago? I can readily see where the benefit comes in to Theodore Thomas, his orchestra, and a few solo singers who, to use a suggestive piratical phrase, "collar the swag," and laugh at the flats who pay for such fragmentary and inartistic performances. I can also see some benefit to the officers, managers, and employés of the festival association, in the cheap glory or profit which their little brief authority brought, not forgetting the niggers who demanded fifty cents a piece for camp-stools. But if anybody can show me a sane reason for paying such extravagant sums of money for such results, I shall only be too happy to acknowledge my inability to form a correct judgment. To my mind this prodigal expenditure has yielded neither instruction nor profit. I think Mastodon festivals place themselves on the level of Mastodon minstrels by making quantity rather than quality an attraction. To advertise the biggest soprano, the biggest band, and the biggest chorus, is but following the example of Haverly, who claims to have more niggers in his Black Hundred than any other minstrel show, and asks the public to "count 'em." The only reasonable excuse for the existence of a music festival is to exhibit the musical resources of the community in which it is held, and in this respect the Damrosch festival of 1881 was a legitimate display of the resources of New York and its tributary cities.

But what position does Chicago occupy in the late Festival? All the principal features, including leader, orchestra, and solo-singers, were brought from other localities and advertised, à la Barnum, as curiosities. And such indeed some of them proved to be, notably the big German frau, with her big voice, and the big chested Candidus, and the brawny Campanini, who made themselves heard in the forte passages, at least, to the occupants of the seats in the lower half of the barnlike structure, giving a satisfactory exhibition of physical powers; but as for such little piping voices as Mrs Osgood or Mr Toedt, their numbers might as well have been given to an audience of deaf and dumb people. The choir then was the only Chicago portion of the festival, and though its work was comparatively creditable, it was not equal to so pretentious an occasion, and greatly inferior to the oratorio work of such choirs as the Boston Handel and Haydn, the Philadelphia Cecilian. This, however, is not to be wondered at, since it was scratched together to do duty as a festival chorus and serve as tail to the Th. Thomas kite. It was, perhaps, fortunate for the public that the Chicago contribution was confined to the choir, if the ladies who took the parts of the three Rhine Daughters in the fragment of Wagner's Rheingold on Friday afternoon were a sample of home talent. I am not familiar with the libretto of the Rheingold, but know that Wagner is nothing if not descriptive; so that, at first, I suppose the unearthly dissonances were provided by the great master to illustrate the outcries of three maidens entering a vocal protest against being drowned in Rhine-water, and shivered an involuntary tribute to his genius in reproducing such a discordant idea, but with the aid of a powerful glass, I discovered from the grimaces on the face of the divine Theodore that the idea was not of Wagnerian but of Chicagoan origin.

The Thomas Travelling Festival is an imitation of, but not an improvement upon, the Oratorio Festival of England, which flourishes like a bay tree, because a raison d'être exists in a genuine love of classic music, and a desire to excel in its performance. There, masses of thousands of singers may be obtained to give The Messiah and kindred works from memory with entire fidelity to the original score, being familiar with them from earliest childhood. The band, as well as the choir, is there of local origin, and the solo parts generally assumed by local favourites, though sometimes renowned singers are brought from abroad to give éclat to the occasion. But in these feasts there is nothing served up like the matinée programmes of the Chicago Festival, which were as Joseph's coat, of many colours and many shreds and patches. It may be said that Mr Thomas is not responsible for the patchwork character of these programmes, and the fact that the fragments of which they are composed are from works of acknowledged masters may be used as an argument in their favour. But Mr Thomas poses as an educator, and one to whom all the devices of the showman are abhorrent. What are these patchwork programmes made for except to pander to a morbid appetite for novelty, and catch the dollars of the uncultivated masses by the usual catch-penny display of puffs and portraits of singers, thus advertised into notoriety, which passes for merit with such people as lack musical intelligence. Materna certainly deserves all the notoriety she has achieved, and yet I will match Emma Abbott against her for drawing a house. It may flatter our vanity to be called a musical people, and Mr Thomas has not been above putting his name to a magazine article in which the assertion is made; but it certainly is not true as applied to the masses, and particularly that large class of business men upon whose patronage such travelling festival enterprise must depend for financial success.

It is the Hip! Hip!! Hurrah!!! and the Fizz! Bang!! Boom!!! which catches the swell mob, and the Thomas travelling festival will play itself out as soon as the limit is reached, beyond which the Fizz! Bang!! Boom!!! business loses its novelty. When the study of music shall be made compulsory in our public schools, as it should be, and our children learn to read music as they do their letters, classic music would be enjoyed even more than the prevalent rubbish of to-day. Then, and not until then, may we truthfully claim to be a musical people, and it is a great pity our law-makers cannot be made to realize that it would be a profitable investment to impart such a knowledge to the rising generation as would do more towards abolishing these low places of resort which degrade music into a temptation for intemperance, and a cloak for vice, than all the sumptuary laws the ingenuity of man can devise. The Thomas travelling festival has not yet made a raid into St Louis, and it is to be hoped for the sake of St Louis it may not, for it brought neither financial nor artistic success to Chicago. In saying this, I do not wish to detract from the just meed of praise due to the genius of Thomas as a leader, the exceptional skill of his orchestra as musicians, or the phenomenal merit of such artists as Materna, Cary, Candidus, and Campanini; but it was simply a physical impossibility to give a satisfactory performance in a building where more than one half the audience stood, or sat, in positions where the delicate playing of the instruments, the enunciations of the words, even the intonations of the voices, were inaudible, while the facial expression of the singers were invisible.

Stuttgart.—The anniversary of the Conservatory, which ought properly to have been held on the 15th April, that being the day on which the institution was founded, passed off in a satisfactory manner. The King, who, since 1867, has been its patron, bestowed decorations on the director, Dr Faist, the business-manager, Dr. Scholl, and Herren Lebert, Stark, and Keller, who have belonged from the first to the professional staff.

Leipsic.—An interesting collection of autograph MSS. and letters of eminent composers was recently brought to the hammer by Liszt and Francke. The Mendelssohn MSS., mostly from the collection of the late Schleinitz (15 lots), realized 9,212 marks, out of which the score and pianoforte arrangement of St Paul counted for 6,590 (score 4,090, the arrangement 2,500); a volume of 25 leaves, 990 marks; his last composition (2 leaves), 646 marks; lots 25, 28, and 29 (4 leaves, 2 leaves, and 1 leaf), 196, 175, and 160 marks respectively. Four MSS. of Schubert's fetched 5,145 marks, 940 marks being given for the four pianoforte sonatas. A volume of old sacred compositions copied out by Mozart brought 700 marks; Beethoven's still unpublished "Tattoo" 630; and his Note Book, 1,300. The sale was attended by bidders from Paris, Dresden, Dessau, and America.

DILETTANTE.—Yes, the late and never-too-much-regretted Angiolina Bosio played Semiramide in Paris (Salle Ventadour), with Borghi-Mamo as Arsace; and she was the original Zerlina of Fra Diavolo at the Royal Italian Opera, introducing at the beginning of Act II., the florid bravura air from Le Serment (another opera by Auber), which was wont to rouse the audience to enthusiasm. With regard to these particulars "Dilettante" is right; in all others he is wrong. The "originals" in Rossini's Conte Ory, at Covent Garden, were Bosio, Gardoni, and Ronconi.

CONCERTS.

THE concert-season proper may now be said to have reached its climax. The German performances, under Richter and Hallé, have terminated, the one with Beethoven's Choral Symphony, the other with the Mass in D. About these, however, and the Crystal Palace Concerts (also coming to an end with the Choral Symphony—which will soon be tabooed by the "advanced school," like the Battle of Prague, Don Giovanni, and the Sonnambula, as worn out and effete), we have a summary in hand, wherein divers signs of the times are discussed.

I have stated that, at first, before the Jewish agitation, of which the motives were concealed in so remarkable a manner, was commenced against me, there were signs of a desire to enter into a discussion and investigation, conducted in an honourable German fashion, of the views advanced in my writings on art. Let us suppose this agitation had not been set on foot, or that, as would have been just, it had been frankly and honourably limited to its immediate cause, the question we should then have to answer would be: what turn would the matter have then taken, according to the analogy of similar passages in the undisturbed progress of German civilization? I am not of the optimist opinion that very much would have resulted from such a turn, but something, at any rate, might have been expected, and certainly something different from what actually occurred. If we understand the case correctly, the period had arrived for music as well as for poetical literature, to convert into the common property of the nation, and of the world, the treasures bequeathed by the incomparable masters who, in a compact series, represent the great regeneration itself of German art. The question was what direction this conversion would take. It assumed the most definite form with regard to music, for here, thanks to the latter periods of Beethoven's course of creation, this art had entered upon a completely new phase of development, far surpassing all the views and assumptions previously entertained of it. Under the guidance of Italian vocal music, music generally had become an art that merely pleased; thus its capability of obtaining the same importance as the art of Dante, and of Michael Angelo, was altogether denied it, and it was placed among arts that were avowedly inferior. A completely new recognition of the nature of music was, therefore, to be gained from the great Beethoven; the root whence it had grown to such a height and to such significance, was to be intelligently traced back, through Bach, to Palestrina, in order thus to found for its æsthetical appreciation, a completely different system from what that system could possibly be which was based upon our taking cognizance of a development very foreign to these masters.

The proper sentiment of this was quite instinctively alive in the German musicians of the period, and I here designate to you Robert Schumann, as the most significative and the most highly endowed among them. In the course of his development as a composer, we can most clearly prove the influence exerted upon our art by the Jewish element which I have described. Compare the Robert Schumann of his first, and the Robert Schumann of his second, creative period: in the former, we find plastic fashioning impulse; in the latter, subsidence into bombastic superficiality degenerating into would-be mysterious shallowness. Corresponding with this is the fact that, in the second period, Schumann looked unfavourably, sullenly, and apathetically upon those to whom, during his first period, he had, as editor of the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, offered his hand with such warmth, and with such German amiability. In the bearing of this paper, in which Schumann (with an instinct which was also correct) exerted himself as an author, for the task imposed upon us, you can perceive equally well with what a mind I should have had to take counsel, had I had to come to an understanding with him alone as to the problems which were occupying my attention; we here, indeed, meet with a different language to the dialectic Jewish jargon at last introduced into our new æsthetics, and—I maintain my assertion—in this language, we should have come to an advantageous understanding. But what was it which gave the Jewish influence this power? Unfortunately, one of the German's leading virtues is also a source of his weaknesses. The calm, dispassionate self-confidence, peculiar to him, which keeps all soul-tormenting scruples at a distance, and sends forth so many a thoroughly truthful deed from his equable nature, when undisturbed, may, if there is only a slight deficiency of the necessary fire, easily turn into that wonderful slothfulness in which, owing to the continuous neglect of all the higher desires of the German spirit in powerful political spheres, we now behold nearly all those minds sunk which have remained quite faithful to German nature. Into this slothfulness sank, also, the genius of Robert Schumann, when he found it a trouble to make a stand against the busy and unquiet Jewish spirit; it was fatiguing for him to have always to gain a clear comprehension of what was going forward. Thus he unconsciously lost his noble freedom and thus his old friends, whom he at last actually disowned, lived to see him carried off in triumph by the Jews of Music as one of their party!—Well, my respected friend, this, I think, was a result which meant something, was it not? The mention of Schumann's case relieves us at any rate from the task of throwing a light on less important instances of subjugation, which were more easily effected in consequence of this most important one.

But these personal results are supplemented by those in the domain of associations and societies. Here, also, the German mind, in conformity with its natural disposition, showed itself disposed to prove by deeds what it felt. The idea, which I mentioned to you as the task of our post-Beethovenian period, really united, for the first time, a continually increasing number of German musicians and musical amateurs, for objects which obtained their natural significance by the conception of that task. That excellent person, Franz Brendel, with faithful perseverance, first started this, in consequence of which it became the custom of the Jewish papers to adopt a contemptuous tone with him; and we must consider it as really glorious for him to have also seen what was necessary in this respect. The weakness, however, of the whole German system of association could not fail to manifest itself the sooner in this instance, since an association of German musicians was opposed not, for instance, to the powerful spheres of state organizations conducted by different governments, as is the case with other free associations condemned to similar ineffectiveness, but to the most powerful organization of our age, to that of Judaism. It was evident that a great Union composed of musicians could exercise a beneficial influence only by adopting the practical plan of giving the most admirable model performances of works of importance for the development of German musical style; for this, means were requisite; but the German musician is poor; what will help him? Certainly not talking and disputing about art-interests, which for many can never possess any meaning, and easily lead to the Ridiculous. But the power we did not possess belonged to Judaism. The theatres were dedicated to Squiredom and larks behind the scenes; the concert-institutes to the Music-Jews; what was left for us? A small musical paper, or so, which reported the upshot of the meetings that took place every two years.

HOW HE SOLD HER;

(Or, The very Triste 'un who didn't make room for his Uncle.)

Wagner's Tristan and Isolda is about the most wearisome thing we've sat out for some considerable time. Had it been by a young English composer, or an elderly English composer of the Hanwellian School, it would not have been tolerated for half-an-hour after its commencement. For ourselves, if of two penances we had to choose one, either to sit out a long, dull sermon in a stuffy church on an August afternoon, or to hear one act of Tristan and Isolda, we should unhesitatingly select the former, where, at all events, there would be the certainty of a tranquil repose, from which no cruel drum, bassoon, or violoncello, but only the snoring of our own nose, could rouse us. That there are occasional snatches of melody is undeniable, but a snatch here and there is not the grasp of a master-hand to hold an audience. Judicious selections will always be welcome; but that, taken as a whole, it is the embodiment of stupendous boredom, must be the verdict of all English Opera-goers who delight in the operas of — — — — — — — — — — — — and we are not afraid to add, even in these days of æsthetic mysticism, art-vagueness, and higher cultchaw, ——. What is the plot? This, simply:—

How Sir Tristan in a barque
Convoys to his Uncle Mark
Fair Isolde and confidante.
Fair Isolde will be his Aunt
When his Uncle Mark she weds,
But Isolde and Maid their heads
Put together, and the latter,
After "lengths" of weary chatter,
Gives a drink, though very loth,
To Isolde and Tristan. Both
Drain the cup without a notion
They are quaffing a Love-potion.
Each o'ercome by t'other's charms,
Falls into the other's arms.
Then she marries—fie for shame!—
Mark—and goes on just the same.
Till one day, just after dark,
With some friends comes Uncle Mark
To the garden, and discovers
In each other's arms the lovers.
He upbraids in music heavy
His immoral graceless nevvy.
Tristan rounds upon one Melot,
Once his friend—a sneaking fellow—
Who pulls out his snicker-snee,
Wounding Tristan mortallee;
For in next mad Act he shies
Bandages away, and dies;
Melot's killed by Tristan's man,
Who, in turn, dies how he can.
Then Isolde's Maid, half daft,
Tells about the amorous draught;
Isolde, singing her own doom,
Dies—wherever she finds room;
Uncle Mark, freed from the lot,
Blesses corpses. Such the plot!

The arrangement of the scene on board ship, in the First Act, with a curtain drawn at will, discovering "Knights and Attendants arranged like waxworks, who, on their showing any sign of lively melody, are at once shut up by the confidante closing the curtain sharply, so that they are "left singing," is such utter burlesque that any dramatic critic, except an outwagnerous Wagnerite, would condemn the situation as ludicrous in the extreme. Then, after they have both quaffed the cup, these are Wagner's stage-directions.

"Both, seized with shuddering, gaze with deepest emotion, but immovable demeanour, into one another's eyes, in which the expression of defiance to death fades and melts into the glow of passion. Trembling seizes them, they convulsively clutch their hearts, and pass their hands over their brows."

If this, so far, isn't good old melodramatic "business" of the most hackneyed kind, belonging to the Victorian Era, or the palmy days of the Drama, we don't know it when we see it, that's all.

"Their glances again seek to meet, sink in confusion, and once more turn with growing longing upon one another."

This is practically carried out by Isolda and Tristan going through wild extension motions opposite one another, until they are locked in each other's arms, and this situation would be satisfactory if they had only one key between them, but as it seemed to our distracted ear, the lady shrieked spasmodically, while the gentleman growled, occasionally varying it with a shout; both of them being, apparently, without the vaguest idea of time, tune, or harmony, but only too glad to get in a shriek or a growl whenever and wherever they could, and observing as a sort of Happy-Thought rule, obviously given them by that clever Herr Richter—"Keep your eyes on your Conductor, and your Conductor will pull you through."

This sort of music can never, in our lifetime at least, thank goodness, become popular with the British public. It may, as Dr Johnson said of the violoncello performance, be wonderful, but we only wish it were impossible. Wagner's lyrical-dramatic music requires no operatic vocalists at all. Let there be a first-rate orchestra, a book of the plot in hands of the audience, and tableaux vivants or dissolving views to illustrate it—as illustration is still necessary for the illiterate. To ourselves, speaking as mere laics in the matter, with a fondness for tune, harmony, and good dramatic situations, it seems that singing and acting are thrown away on such vocal music and such tedious and unsavoury libretti. If Wagner, his Royal patron, the King of Bavaria, and his countrymen generally, like this sort of thing, they are perfectly welcome to keep it to themselves, and we don't mind hearing occasionally The ——, The —— (abbreviated), or selections from —— and ——.

I can't abide this mental strain.

MR D'OYLY CARTE has arranged that the new comic opera by Messrs Sullivan and Gilbert, now approaching completion, shall be produced simultaneously at the Standard Theatre, New York; the Globe Theatre, Boston; and the Lyceum Theatre, Philadelphia, at the opening of the autumn season. This will put a stop to piracies, at any rate in the leading American cities. In order to preserve the copyright, the work must be performed also simultaneously in this country.

M. W. BALFE.—Among the unpublished MSS. left by this popular composer two pieces of sacred music have been brought to light, namely, an "Agnus Dei" and a "Sanctus." They were written in 1846 for the Princess Adelaide, the sister of King Louis Philippe, and they are full of beauty and dignity of character. The writing is both scientific and effective. They have been arranged and adapted to English words taken from the Psalms, by Mr W. A. Barrett, and will be probably sung for the first time in England at Westminster Abbey, on the day when the Balfe tablet is unveiled.—Morning Post.

CONCERTS.

Mdme Nilsson.—Mdme Christine Nilsson's concert at St James's Hall, in aid of the funds of the English Church, Rue d'Aguessau, Paris, was, as might have been expected, a real success. This gifted and accomplished lady, always ready to lend her name and devote her great talents to any good cause, invariably wins a hearty response from the public, and the present occasion was by no means an exception to the rule. But such a concert, as that given by Mdme Nilsson, would at any time, or under any circumstances, secure favour, the lady having enlisted the services of other eminent artists to assist her in carrying out an excellent programme. On her appearance to sing the "Jewel Song" from Faust, Mdme Nilsson received a very hearty greeting, justified by her performance. Retaining full possession of her fine voice, with the power to modulate at will, she imparted to the air all the peculiar charm for which her singing has so long been renowned. These qualities, aided by a play of feature in admirable taste, made the auditors fancy the Margherita of the stage was before them gazing upon the jewels. In the "Miserere" from Il Trovatore, assisted by Mr Maas and a chorus, her dramatic powers had full scope for display, and at the persistent wish of the audience an encore was granted. Later on she sang Mr Louis Engel's "Lost," accompanied by the composer, and, in response to another encore, gave one of her characteristic Swedish national airs in her most characteristic and delightful manner. The duet, "La Luna immobile" (Boïto), sung by Mdme Trebelli and Mdme Nilsson, and Bizet's "L'Amour," by Mdme Trebelli, were among the most attractive features of the programme. Mr Maas, by rare beauty of voice and refinement of style, gave the wonted effect to Blumenthal's "Message," winning enthusiastic applause. Mr Cusins played Thalberg's "Fantasia (Moïse) for the pianoforte" with his usual accuracy and finish; while M. Musin, the violinist, in Variations sérieuses sur une gavotte de Corelli (Tartini), exhibited both a classic style and remarkable executive skill. The bijou drawing-room orchestra played several pieces very agreeably, and the pianoforte accompaniments were shared between Messrs Bevignani and Sidney Naylor.

Mr. Kuhe.—Mr Kuhe's annual morning concert at St James's Hall might be deemed an event of importance in a season without parallel in the musical history of London. The distinguished professor announced an excellent programme, and a list of performers embracing singers attractive both in the concert-room and on the stage. Prominent among those connected with Mr Gye's establishment were Mdme Albani and Mdme Pauline Lucca, the former winning an easy triumph in "Ah! fors' è lui" (Verdi), the latter equally successful in "Quell 'uomo al fiero" (Auber). Mdme Albani's superb voice and finished style gave such unbounded satisfaction as to excite persistent demands for an encore, which was conceded by the gifted artist; while Mdme Lucca, after a dramatic rendering of the air from Fra Diavolo, responded to the wish of the audience with another song. Later on the lady introduced a new American ballad, "Sweet Angelus was ringing" (Operti), the piquant character of which gave further opportunities for the exhibition of her captivating talents. Signor de Reszké, by a good voice and fine musicianship, imparted significance to a romance, "L'Extase" (Wieniawski). A "Slumber Song" (Tito Mattei) was introduced for the first time by Mdme Trebelli and M. Musin (violin obbligato) with success. The renowned contralto likewise sang the "Gavotte" from Mignon, in her accustomed genial manner. Mdme Marie Roze took the vocal part in Gounod's "Ave, Maria," the other executants being M. Musin, Messrs Pittman and Kuhe; while Mr Santley, in a Chanson Arabe, "Medjè" (Gounod), exhibited to admiration those fine qualities which have made his name famous. Miss Robertson, in the gay and tuneful ditty, "Bird of the spring time" (Randegger), interested the audience by her sprightly and brilliant vocalization, and, in the course of the afternoon, joined her sister in duets perfectly delivered. Mdme Antoinette Sterling appealed to lovers of English ballad in Blumenthal's "Sunshine after Rain," while Miss Mary Davies's pure voice and tender expression gave adequate significance to Mr Kuhe's "Birds and Flowers." Another excellent composition by Mr Kuhe was introduced for the first time by Mr F. Barrington Foote. Mdlle Doré Desvignes, Mdlle Nordman, and M. Massart also assisted. M. Hollman, the violoncellist, increased his reputation by an admirable performance, in which his rich tone and beauty of phrasing were conspicuous. M. Musin achieved like honours in a "Berceuse" (Faure) and a "Mazurka" (Musin)—both given to perfection. Mr Kuhe limited himself to one short solo, but that more than sufficed to establish the long-recognized ability of the concert-giver as a pianist. The conductors were Signor Bevignani, Mr W. Ganz, Signor Randegger, and Mr Kuhe.—W. B. K.

The matinée d'invitation given by Mr William Dorrell on Tuesday, June 20th, at his new residence in Baker Street, Portman Square, was one of the most agreeable we have had the gratification of attending during the present musical season. The following varied and excellent programme will go far to explain this:—

Minuetto and Rondo from the Sonata Duo, Op. 32—pianofcrte and violoncello—(W. S. Bennett), Mr W. Dorrell and Mr W. E. Whitehouse; Tema and Variations, Op. 34—pianoforte—(Beethoven), Mr W. Dorrell; Song, "There is dew for the flow'ret" (G. A. Macfarren), Miss Marian McKenzie; Andante Cantabile—pianoforte and violin—(W. Dorrell), Mr W. Dorrell and M. Sainton; Song, "Spinning" (Cowen), Miss Clara Samuell; Cavatine and Berceuse for the violin (P. Sainton), M. Sainton; Duet, "The Venetian Boat Song" (Blumenthal), Miss Clara Samuell and Miss Marian McKenzie; Canzonets—pianoforte—"Lullaby" and "Welcome" (G. A. Macfarren), Mr W. Dorrell; Quartet, "Les adieux de Raoul de Coucy"—voice, pianoforte, violin, and harp—(Blangini, Moscheles, Mayseder, John Thomas), Miss Clara Samuell, Mr W. Dorrell, M. Sainton, and Mr John Thomas.

It was to be regretted that only one movement of Mr Dorrell's Sonata for pianoforte and violin should be vouchsafed us; but that movement—andante cantabile—by the melodious beauty of its themes and the grace of their harmonic treatment, of itself created the liveliest interest. It was played, moreover, in perfection. Mr Dorrell's performance of Beethoven's "Tema and variations," as well as of the two charming Canzonets by Professor Macfarren, could hardly have been excelled; and as much may be said for the interpretation, in association with Mr E. Whitehouse, of the excerpts from Sterndale Bennett's admirable Sonata. The concert ended with the once so popular "Adieux de Raoul de Coucy," a composition written clearly with a view to exhibit the executive skill of each of the four artists engaged in its performance. On the present occasion, the execution must have satisfied the most critical ear. The vocalists named in the programme all did their very best, and were ably accompanied on the pianoforte by Mr H. Rose. The entertainment, in short, was, from first to last, creditable to Mr Dorrell and satisfactory to his guests. So thorough a pianist and musician—so genuine an artist, in short—as this gentleman should come more frequently before the public.

M. Vladimir de Pachmann's "Recital," on Thursday afternoon, afforded that excellent artist an opportunity of further enforcing his claims as a pianist. At any time the exercise of such talents as his would be acceptable, but now, when energy and force pass too readily for true art, it is more than ever desirable that execution, characterized by refinement and grace, should be heard. The programme was excellent, though exception might be made to the concoctions by Liszt. Some of the pieces, little known in the concert-room, were most acceptable, and we would especially name the Bagatelle, No. 4, Op. 126 (Beethoven), not only for its intrinsic charm, but also for the skill with which it was presented. On the other hand, Schubert's Impromptu in A flat minor is familiar enough, and, without attempting any "new reading," the pianist gave it with admirable taste and discretion. M. de Pachmann's rendering of Mendelssohn's Scherzo à Capriccio, in F sharp minor, had also distinctive merit. Rubinstein's Mélancholie was given with unaffected sentiment. The selection from Chopin's compositions were highly appreciated, especially the Barcarole, Op. 60.

The matinée musicale of Mdlle Victoria de Bunsen the Swedish vocalist was as well attended by the fashion of the season as could be desired, but, unfortunately, the young lady herself could not appear on account of her health which, though somewhat improved as regards the serious illness under which for some time past she has so sadly laboured, was not sufficiently reinstated to risk as yet the excitement, pleasurable and complimentary as it would doubtless have been, of the concert room. Her programme nevertheless was replete with excellent matter, notwithstanding the general regret that was felt at the unavoidable absence of the "founder of the feast," but who, for the reason stated, was denied the privilege of exercising the visible functions of the hostess. In the course of the matinée many things were done which afforded the utmost satisfaction to the general visitants; nor could it be otherwise, for a list of artists comprising the names of Misses Mary Davies, José Sherrington, and De Fonblanque, Mr Thorndike, Signors Ria and Zoboli, as singers, with those of Mdlle Felicia de Bunsen, M. Hollman and Mr Oberthür, as instrumentalists, was obviously rich enough to lend attractiveness to the invitation and ensure the pleasantest of musical réunions. The conductors were Mr Bendall, Signors Pinsuti and Denza. The matinée took place at No. 27, Harley Street, under the immediate patronage of the Princess of Wales.

The concert announced by Mdme Edith Wynne, the well-known and highly esteemed vocalist, for the evening of June 20, at Steinway Hall, was largely attended by her friends, and those of the public, who, cognizant of her talent, were desirous of paying homage where homage was so justly due. The programme was somewhat longer than it need have been, for, although it contained the names of many prominent singers and instrumentalists, the chief interest was necessarily centred in the bénéficiaire, who sang the grand scena from Der Freischütz, "Softly sighs the voice of evening," Benedict's exquisitely graceful ballad, "Rock me to sleep," and one of her own national Welsh songs. To dilate upon the effect produced by Mdme Edith Wynne would be superfluous, she having long enjoyed the reputation of one of the most unanimously accepted heroines and favourites of the concert room, which her efforts upon the present occasion could but verify and confirm. Her coadjutors included many popular artists, among them that general favourite, Mdme Enriquez, Misses Helen Dalton and Maria Fenna; Messrs Abercrombie, W. H. Cummings, and Joseph Sauvage, as vocal contributors, supported by Mr John Thomas (harp), Miss Bessie Waugh (pianoforte), and Mdlle Bertha Brousil (violin), as instrumental soloists. The always welcome and always charming Rosa Kenney, in the course of the evening, gave a highly effective and poetical reading of the potion scene from Romeo and Juliet. Sir Julius Benedict, Mr W. Ganz, Signors Ciro Pinsuti, and Napoleone Carozzi were the conductors.—H.

Mr Selwyn Graham gave a concert at the Steinway Hall on Tuesday morning, June 27, when a fashionable company assembled to listen to the performance of a programme, that was enjoyable in quality, without being wearisome, as in many cases, in length. Mr Graham, exhibiting those earnest qualities that have ever characterized his efforts, and finding a suitable theme in the recit. and air, "Deeper and deeper still" (Handel), sang the impassioned strains with fervency. Miss Annie Selous, by true expression and refined vocalization, imparted charm to Tosti's "Good-bye," and gave indications of dramatic powers in the Miserere scene from Il Trovatore; while Miss Marian McKenzie's fine voice was heard to great advantage in "'Tis I" (Pinsuti), and "The Wedding Day" (Blumenthal). Mr Lewis Thomas, who evidently seems unwilling, as far as he is concerned, to let the deservedly popular "Village Blacksmith" of his friend and comrade, the late W. H. Weiss, sink out of notice, once more sang the familiar strains with genuine taste and feeling. Mr J. T. Hutchinson gave an acceptable version of "Nasce al bosco" (Handel), and vocal quartets by Horsley and Hatton were remarkably well sung by Messrs J. Brown, Dalzell, Beckett, and Bevan. Mr W. Henry Baumer's talents as pianist were displayed in Beethoven's Sonata Pathétique, and Mr W. Henry Thomas was the able conductor.

Signor Ria.—The Vocal and Instrumental Afternoon given by this well known professor of singing on Saturday, June 24, at the Marlborough Rooms, was well supported by his friends and admirers. His own contributions included two Italian songs, which he rendered with all the effusive energy proper to the drawing-room vocalist, participating also in a duet by Donizetti, and a trio by Verdi. His abilities as an expositor of this class of music did not, it may be taken for granted, pass unrecognized, and much applause awaited him, not, be it added, undeservedly. The programme was varied and attractive, but as no respect was paid to the consecutive items put down they got hopelessly mixed before the Afternoon was three parts spent. There were, however, a well selected variety of pieces by Mdme Adelina Paget, Misses Baxter, Berta Foresta, Isabel Grant, Minna Louis, and Marie Vagnolini (with whose names we are only here and there familiar), enforced by Signors Isidore de Lara and Zoboli—the last named a valuable contributor, which his amusing delivery of Gabrielli's aria buffa, "Diceva quinto curzio," and of the famous duet "Quanto amore" (with Mdme Adelina Paget) from L'Elisir d'amore, conclusively proved. The solo instrumentalists were Mdlle Vittorina de Bono (violin), Signor Tito Mattei (pianoforte), and Mr R. Prentice (flute), besides the clever Paggi family, and a couple of incidental recitations by Mr Boyle.—H.

The clever and versatile "Paggi Family" invited their friends to a matinée at the residence of Mr Hyde, Westbourne Terrace, on Thursday, June 15th, and illustrated their musical specialities, individually and collectively, in an agreeably diversified programme. Mdlle Paggi is a pianist, and a very brilliant one, Mdlle Josephine a violinist, Mdlle Anita an excellent flautist, and M. Luciano a violoncellist; while there is another, Mdlle Luida, who figures, and with success, as an elocutionist. Each member of this variously endowed family was afforded an opportunity of personal or combined exhibition, and with results that were warmly appreciated. The vocal reserves were Mdme Frances Brooke, Mdlle Carlotta Peretti, Miss Bessie Holt, Signor Zoboli, and Monsieur Hèly Tecky; the conductors being Signor Romili and Mr P. E. Van Noorden.

Miss Edwards.—This lady merits high consideration both as vocalist and pianist, and thus, doubly armed, gave a matinée musicale on Wednesday, June 21st, at the Marlborough Rooms. In her selection of the "Zingarella" of Campana, the air, "Connais-tu le pays," of Ambrose Thomas, and a song by Milton Wellings, she represented herself in the one capacity very much to the gratification of her audience, while in the other she gave no less satisfactory examples of proficiency in morceaux by Alexander Billet and Scharwenka. The singers were Mdlles Carlottina and Antoinetta Badia, Miss Emily Dones, Mr Stanley Smith, Signors Parisotti and Ria; the instrumentalists being Signor Papini and Herr Otto Leu—altogether an attractive combination.—H.

Signor Eugenio Pirani, an Italian pianist, resident in Berlin, gave a concert on Tuesday afternoon, at St James's Hall, for the benefit of the widow of the late Signor Campana, by whom, unfortunately, pecuniary assistance is but too urgently needed. The room was hardly so well filled as it might have been considering the charitable object in view; nevertheless, there was a tolerably large gathering. The pianoforte works played by Signor Pirani consisted of selections from Beethoven (Sonata, Op. 31), Chopin, Bach, Mendelssohn, and Schumann; his excerpts from the more modern school being confined to a group of pieces by Saint-Saëns and Liszt, which terminated the concert. Signor Pirani is a cultivated and agreeable executant, and delivers his music in a steady, unaffected manner. He also furnished examples of his talents as a composer in some pianoforte morceaux and two German Lieder, sung by Mdlle Alice Barbi, who was heard in an Italian version of Haydn's air, "With verdure clad," and the brilliant "Non più mesta," from Rossini's Cenerentola, in which she displayed commendable and creditable facility.—H.

PROVINCIAL.

Liverpool.—The annual concert by the more advanced pupils of Mr J. J. Monk took place on Saturday afternoon June 24, in the lecture-hall of the Young Men's Christian Association, Mount Pleasant, a large audience attending. Mr Monk has long held a high reputation as a teacher, and his active connection as resident secretary with Trinity College, London, enables him to render important service in the diffusion of musical knowledge in this city and its immediate neighbourhood. They who occupied places in the programme on Saturday, in addition to Mr Monk himself, were Misses Parry, Rosa Cope, Elizabeth Firth, Gertrude Campbell, Helen O'Neile, H. Quick, Mary Sutton, Ada Minns, Annie Smith, Jessie Wiggins, and Eleanor Byers, Mrs Eillison and Mrs Dearle, and Mr G. Stobie. In all cases the pianoforte and harmonium playing was remarkably effective, suggesting judicious training. One of the youngest of the players, Miss Campbell, exhibited excellent qualities in her reading of the Gavotte by J. S. Bach. Three new songs by Mr Monk were introduced, one of which, "The Evening Rest," gracefully written, was expressively sung by Miss Byers. The concert was perhaps the most successful ever given in Mr Monk's name.—Liverpool Mercury.

The furniture and other contents of the house of Mr D. G. Rossetti, No. 16, Cheyne Walk, Chelsea, are to be sold by auction on the premises, on Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday next week at 1 o'clock each day. There is to be a private view to-day, and a public view next Monday and Tuesday.

Philharmonic Society.—The annual general meeting of this Society was held at Trinity College on the 27th inst., when the following gentlemen were elected directors for the ensuing season: Dr Stainer, Messrs Francesco Berger, W. G. Cusins, John Foster, George Mount, Charles E. Stephens, and John Thomas. The dates announced for the concerts next year are: Febuary 15, March 1 and 15, April 25, May 9 and 23.

Joachim Raff.—Our Berlin Correspondent telegraphed last night:—"Joachim Raff, the celebrated composer and pianist, died this morning at Frankfort. He was born in 1822, and was a scholar of Liszt, with whom he resided at Weimar for some time. His first operas, Alfred, Dame Kobald, and Samson, were not very successful, but his symphonies, his quartets, and his numerous compositions for the piano have made him famous in the musical world. Joachim Raff was, together with Clara Schumann, for some years a teacher at the Conservatoire of Dr Hoch, at Frankfort."—Times, June 26.

Arnstadt.—Bernhard Stade, Musical Director and Town Precentor, died on the 29th May. Born on the 2nd May, 1816, at Ettischleben, not far from here, he received his musical education from Gebhardi, in Erfurt, afterwards making concert-tours through Germany and proving himself a genuine organist, especially as interpreter of Bach. Stade was well known as restorer of the Bach Organ in the church of St. Boniface, the instrument being that on which the great master, after receiving his first official appointment, played from 1703 to 1707.

Harry Wall.

The subjoined discussion of the Wall exactions recently appeared as a leading article in the Times:—

Mr Harry Wall's name is not unknown to our readers. It has turned up frequently in the course of a long correspondence in our columns which originated in the case of "Wall v. Harris," to which Mr Wall was a party. It appears to-day in our law reports in the very similar case of "Wall v. Taylor," to which Mr Wall is also a party. The latter action is fairly illustrative of the proceedings which have been taken by the "Copyright and Performing Right Protection Office. Established 1875. Secretary, Harry Wall, Esq.," and which have attracted, naturally enough, much attention. Mr Taylor, the defendant, gave a concert in December, 1880, at the Bolingbroke Hall, at Battersea. An amateur, who was not paid for his services, sang a composition entitled, "Will o' the Wisp." This song—a "descriptive song," as it is called on the title-page—was composed twenty-seven years ago by Mr Cherry, who assigned his rights in 1880 to Mr Wall. The singer had no idea that the production, which he had sung often before, was copyright. But it was "protected;" and Mr Wall served him with a writ for contributing to the amusements of the evening. He also took proceedings against Mr Taylor for penalties under the Copyright Acts. His contention was that the composition was a "dramatic piece" within the 2nd William IV. c. 45; the chief ground for this view being that the singer at a certain verse "laughs ha! ha! and laughs ho! ho!" with due dramatic effect. The jury declined to insult the English drama, even in its present dark days, by finding that it included "laughing ha! ha! and laughing ho! ho!" Mr Wall, however, had another string to his bow; he sued alternately for damages for infringement of his copyright in a musical composition. The jury awarded him a shilling damages, and the Judge showed his sense of the nature of the action by ordering the plaintiff to pay the defendant his costs. Nobody, except Mr Wall, will quarrel with this result. He has got his rights in full, and he deserved nothing more. A recollection of the circumstances of the previous case of "Wall v. Harris" makes one regard the result of "Wall v. Taylor" with entire equanimity. The defendant in the former action sang at an entertainment given at a Working Man's Club, a well-known song—"She wore a wreath of roses," composed by Mr Knight in 1835; a song which had been sung all over the kingdom without question. Mr Wall claimed the statutory penalty of £2, without regard to the ignorance of the singer of the piece being copyright. He got a verdict: and we are not aware that he has waived the penalty or remitted his costs. Mr Wall, to be sure, has purchased the copyrights which he so carefully guards, and the statute mulcts those who sing his songs without paying royalties. But he must take from amateurs his pound of flesh, and nothing more; and he must accept as an incident of his occupation the derision and satisfaction with which his defeat is regarded when he asks too much.

He has, indeed, done good service in opening the eyes of the public to the unexpectedly oppressive effects which may flow from the Copyright Acts when their provisions are pushed to the utmost. He has managed to demonstrate that the present law may be made to work abuses and a practical absurdity. A number of Freemasons, Odd Fellows, or Teetotallers, for example, arrange an entertainment, and wish to enliven it with music. They engage singers and musicians; and, not knowing much about music, they leave it to the performers to choose the pieces which they will play or sing. Inadvertently, one of the musicians selects a piece which is copyright, and which is in Mr Wall's list. Down he may swoop upon the poor performer, or, it may be, upon the managers of the entertainment, who may be innocent of any desire to do Mr Wall harm. Thus persons who acted in the best faith may be compelled to pay forty shillings and solicitor's costs. The letter from Mr Brett, which we published the other day, shows that any one who gets up a concert for the poor, or who gives his services at a musical performance for a charitable object, is liable to be the victim of an enterprising "Protection" secretary. This, we may be sure, was not the design of the Legislature. It was, indeed, intended to protect composers and their assignees against dishonest invaders of their rights. The musician was, in all essentials, to be placed on the same footing as the author. But it was not the wish of the Legislature to frame an Act which would serve as a snare to the unwary amateur. Between the unauthorized publication of a book and the singing of a song without the consent of the composer, there is a distinction which ought not to be slurred over. A man who publishes a pirated edition of a book cannot do so innocently. The slightest care would suffice to inform him that he was trenching upon the rights of others. A book is not printed in an hour or a day; its publication is a deliberate act; and any one who, in fact, sins against the rights of an author may be fairly assumed to do so with malice prepense. But when the promoters of a concert are arranging hurriedly the programme, how are they to know that "By the sad sea waves," "She wore a wreath of roses," "The winds that waft my sighs to thee," "I dreamt that I dwelt in marble halls," "Hear, gentle Maritana," "Yes, let me like a soldier fall" are copyright productions? Perhaps a performer is encored, and responds by singing "There is a flower that bloometh," which may not be in the programme. Are the persons who are responsible for the performance at which this incident takes place to be saddled with a penalty of forty shillings and costs because they did not know that these songs were "protected by Mr Wall?" These questions carry their own answers. It is ridiculous to expect that people can remember on the spur of the moment whether this or that piece by Balfe is copyright.

It might take days to search whether or not "When other lips" has past out of the domain of public property. The most musical of us are not minutely acquainted with the history of the Bohemian Girl or Muleteer; and people will never resign themselves to be punished for ignorance of what they could not well know.

The proceedings which have been taken to vindicate the right to penalties of the assignee of the copyright of songs will have been useful if they lead to one or two simple alterations of the law. Let there be no cutting down the property of composers; they get no more than is the due of genius, and if they sell it to others their assignees are entitled to enjoy all that the composer possessed. But an amateur should have the means of knowing whether a song is protected. The title-page should give distinct warning of the fact. It would be sufficient, as suggested by several correspondents, if the words "right of performance reserved" were printed on each piece of music to which Mr Wall or persons in his position laid claim. The last to complain of facilities being afforded to amateurs to perform music without being in danger of being involved in litigation would be composers, who rejoice in anything which gives popularity and publicity to their works. And we do not doubt that most of the assignees of their rights would also welcome a change in the law which would not affect their receipts and which would prevent the Copyright Acts being made instruments of oppression. The musical amateur has a grievance, and we fear that he will have to wait indefinitely for justice.

Mdme Christine Nilsson signed, on Saturday, an engagement with Mr Henry Abbey, of New York, for a series of concert appearances in the United States during next winter. This will set at rest many rumours current about the intentions of Mdme Nilsson during the season of 1882-3.

Herr Schuberth, of the Schubert Society, announces his "Benefit Concert" for next Thursday evening, when he will have the assistance of several eminent vocalists and instrumentalists. The indefatigable director will doubtless be rewarded for his zealous and continued exertions in the direction of pure art by a large attendance.

Madame Bernhardt-Damala, who is now enjoying a holiday at her country house near Le Hâvre, will return to England about the middle of August in order to fulfil an extensive round of provincial engagements, including Ireland and Scotland. She will not, however, perform again in London till June next year, when she will commence an engagement at the Gaiety, for six weeks—that is, three times as long as her engagement just terminated. It is no secret that the recent performances of this distinguished actress have been by far the most popular of all her appearances in this country.—Daily News.

Vienna.—There are 548 members of and subscribers to the Imperial Opera Pension Fund, while 170 persons receive regular pensions or occasional relief. Its entire income for last year amounted to 131,365 florins, 26 kreutzers.—The Haydn Memorial Committee have selected Heinrich Natter's life-size model of the great master and ordered the artist to execute it in marble. When the statue is completed it will be set up in the Esterhazy Park.

New York.—Maurice Grau intends having two French opera companies next season: Comic Opera, with most of his old artists, and a buffo opera, with Mdlle Theo as star.—A lyric farce, The Two Medallions, already played in different parts of the country with varying success, will shortly be produced. The composer is a resident of Evansville, Indiana.—Negotiations, which may lead to the establishment of a permanent English Operahouse in this city, are said to be pending between Mallory, manager of the Madison Square Theatre, and Frederick Archer.

TONIC SOL-FA.

In the report of the proposed Revised Code of Education, it is stated that Government grants are to be given to those schools in which the Tonic Sol-fa system of notation is taught. This announcement shows that the time has arrived when the merits of the Tonic Sol-fa system should be searchingly examined. So long as Tonic Sol-fa teaching was self-supporting, its advocates had the right to promulgate their opinions, and to carry them out in practice; but when their system is about to be upheld by a large expenditure of money, raised by taxation, they stand in a totally different position, and the public have a right to inquire on what grounds they are called upon to support a system hitherto upheld by only a small minority, and opposed to the principles on which music is generally taught in every part of the civilized globe. It may seem ungracious to disparage a system which has afforded, and is capable of affording, enjoyment to thousands of singers and numerous audiences, but when we are asked to vote money for the support of this system on the ground that it can furnish "musical education" for the people, we are compelled to point out that it teaches one branch of music—sight-singing—and nothing else. It facilitates sight-singing by the "movable Do;" the key-note or Tonic—no matter what the key—being always "Do;" the fifth interval "Sol," and so on. The idea is not new, and was a century back adopted by Italian singing-masters, but has long since been discarded by their successors. The "movable Do" renders unnecessary the flats and sharps by which keys are indicated in the old notation, and the Tonic Sol-fa pupil, having only to acquire a knowledge of intervals and time, is soon enabled to sing at sight—whether in solo or concerted music—any vocal music translated into the syllables and arbitrary marks which constitute the Tonic Sol-fa notation. This is a fair statement of the advantages claimed for the Tonic Sol-fa system, and it must be ungrudgingly admitted that, under that system, large numbers of pupils have been enabled to display remarkable proficiency in sight-singing, and the choral singing at the Tonic Sol-fa Festivals at the Crystal Palace has been highly satisfactory. If proficiency in sight-singing and choral singing were the summum bonum of musical art, much might be said for the new system, although it must be remarked that far superior singing has been presented by the Henry Leslie choir, Mr. Barnby's choir, and other choral bodies employing the old notation. It must, however, be pointed out that the 4,000 singers who took part in the last Tonic Sol-fa Festival could not have sung a note of the compositions they executed had they not been translated into Tonic Sol-fa notation, and were restricted to the limited repertory of works printed in that notation. There are many hundreds of splendid choral works which to them would have been as so much Greek, although perfectly intelligible to persons trained on the accepted system of notation, no matter to what nation they might belong. To the latter, music speaks a universal language; to the former it is incomprehensible, unless clothed in the fantastic guise under which it has been introduced to them by soi-disant teachers of music.

A remarkable illustration of the disadvantages attendant on the new system was afforded last year. The Philharmonic Society, at great expense, furnished engraved copies of the choral parts of Mr Hueffer's English adaptation of Berlioz's Romeo and Juliet symphony to the South London Choral Association, who, under the able direction of their teacher, Mr Venables, learned the music perfectly, and sang it well. The Philharmonic Society were subsequently called upon to defray the cost of a set of Tonic Sol-fa chorus parts, which had been absolutely indispensable to the South London Sol-fa Choralists, because they were unable to read the notes as written by Berlioz. Consequently, the Philharmonic Society have this season formed a choir of their own, selected from the large mass of amateurs who are able to read the Choral Symphony of Beethoven and other important choral works in the original notation. Perhaps there may be enthusiastic votaries of the Tonic Sol-fa system ready to contend that all such works should forthwith be translated into their notation, but most people will agree in thinking that le jeu ne vaut pas la chandelle. Tonic Sol-fa singers are restricted to such works as their teachers may think fit to include in their répertoire; the teachers—being familiar with the old notation—are alone competent to examine and recommend such additions, and the pupils are at their mercy. Properly taught pupils would be able to peruse and enjoy, and estimate for themselves the value of boundless stores of music which must be to them as sealed books so long as their musical knowledge is restricted to Sol-fa notation.

Were the Tonic Sol-faists able to show that a knowledge of sight singing is difficult to acquire with the old notation, their case would be stronger than it is. As a matter of fact, thousands of children under ten years of age, and many only half that age, are perfectly familiar with the old notation, which is more easily learnt than the multiplication-table. When Mr John Hullah—to whom more than to any other man living we are indebted for the rapid march of musical progress during the last forty years—in 1840 commenced his system of class-teaching, he found no formidable difficulty in rendering the notation of Guido D'Arezzo and Franco of Cologne intelligible. His pupils were attracted from the lowest as well as the highest classes of society, and "music for the million" became a realized fact in connection with the system of notation which the Tonic Sol-faists decry. Real progress in art should be encouraged, but needless and fantastic innovations should be condemned. Mr Hullah's pupils, and those still taught on his system, have acquired the alphabet of music, and are on the road to its syntax. The Tonic Sol-fa pupil must unlearn or discard all he has learnt, and begin, de novo, if he desire really to study music, and to enjoy its combinations—for harmony forms no part of "music" as taught by the Tonic Sol-faists. If it be urged that he may hereafter learn the accepted notation, let us ask why we should pay for his instruction on a system confessedly insufficient? There is another phase of the subject which demands notice. We are told that our Liberal Government desires to provide instruction in music for the poor as well as the rich. This specious pretext may speedily be dismissed. Any Sol-fa pupil who, on leaving an elementary school, may wish to learn an instrument—say, the violin—will find that he cannot even read the notes of his first exercise in scales, because he has not been taught "music." Which of the "rich" would be content to have his child taught music on the Sol-fa system alone? And why should the poor be tricked into believing that their children are learning music when they are but wasting time in acquiring knowledge of a very limited branch of art?

> "Untwisting all the links that tie
> The hidden soul of harmony,"

We may hereafter endeavour to show that music can easily be taught on the old system in elementary schools. So far as concerns the Tonic Sol-fa system, in connection with Governmental grants for the teaching of music in those schools, it can only be regarded as "a mockery, a delusion, and a snare."—Globe.

Royal Italian Opera.—The revival of Auber's comic opera, Fra Diavolo, was a genuine success, the house being full and the gratification of the audience marked. With Mdme Pauline Lucca in his company Mr Gye was certain not to overlook the claims of Fra Diavolo, nor to disappoint the expectation of a public who remembered a certain piquant and charming Zerlina familiar to the Covent Garden stage twelve years ago. The manager's course was clear, and he was rewarded for following it. Doubtless Auber had his own audience on Thursday night—those who went to hear for the sake of music which does not contain a dull bar, nor, in its simplest passages, a bar unworthy of the genial and gifted composer. Nevertheless, the more immediate attraction lay in Mdme Lucca's embodiment of the innkeeper's daughter; one of the freshest and most charming characters on the lyric stage. The lady's conception of her part remains what it was when she last appeared amongst us. It has not even been re-touched for the sake of broader outline, more striking colour, or consequent new effect. This is well, since change wrought upon a thing so perfect in its way could not possibly be for the better. Mdme Lucca played with quiet humour in the first act, and in the bed-room scene with delightful naïveté, giving forcible expression to the harmless vanity of the maiden who feels that her beauty has conquered a lover, and to the unrestrained joy of an expectant bride. We need not insist upon this. The second act of Fra Diavolo is a cheval de bataille that always carries Mdme Lucca to victory. Her singing was conspicuous for its firmness and certainty; and it will be assumed that the scene before the looking-glass was a perfect example of natural and ingenuous acting. Lady Coburg was represented by Mdlle Lonati somewhat tamely; while the Lord Coburg of Signor Scolara, though by no means overflowing with superfluous humour, compared advantageously with that once made familiar on the same stage by Signor Ciampi. M. Lestellier's Fra Diavolo had little dramatic significance; but the artist was fortunate in singing music written for the school to which he belongs. His best effort was made in "Agnese la Zitella," which was encored. Giacomo and Beppo were made as amusing as usual by M. Dauphin and Signor Guerini, the cast being completed by Signor Corsi (Lorenzo) and Signor Raguer (Mattei). Signor Bevignani conducted, and the general performance did him credit.—P.G.

Mr Frederic Penna's interesting lecture on Mendelssohn's Elijah, originally given at the Beethoven Rooms, when Sir Julius Benedict accompanied the illustrations, is to be delivered at the Birkbeck Institution on Wednesday evening next.

Mr Santley will sing at Toole's Theatre this afternoon, on the occasion of Mr Toole's double benefit; and in the evening Mr Sims Reeves, if sufficiently recovered from his recent indisposition, will appear as Tom Tug, in Dibdin's still popular comic opera, The Waterman. The double programme is of a most extensive kind, including comedietta, farce, burlesque, recitations, and songs. Besides Mr Toole, with the regular company of his theatre and the vocalists already mentioned, the list of performers includes Miss Ellen Terry, Mdmes Keeley, Amadi, Bancroft, and Kendal, Messrs Irving, Bancroft, and Herbert Reeves.

It is Eduard (not Johann) Strauss who goes to New York next season as conductor at the Casino.

The Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha's opera, Diana von Solange, is in rehearsal at Kroll's Theatre, Berlin.

A new opera, Maria Tiepolo, by Baron Crescimano, has been produced at the Theatre Royal, Malta.

The Italian operatic season at the Teatro Ciblis, Montevideo, was inaugurated with La Forza del Destino.

Carl Mayer, barytone, of the Stadttheater, Cologne, succeeds Reichmann at the Theatre Royal, Munich.

There is some talk of giving Lohengrin and the Duca d'Alba in September, at the Sala Beethoven, Barcelona.

The Stadttheater, Leipsic, will open under the Stägemann management on the 1st August, with Die Zauberflöte.

Teresina Singer was lately to appear at a concert in Florence in aid of the School for the Instruction of the Blind.

Don Eduardo Compta, professor of the piano in the Escuela Nacional de Música y Declamacion, has died at Madrid.

An "Andante Elegiaco" in honour of Garibaldi, by Filippo Sangiorgio, was well received at the Teatro Comunale, Ferrara.

Teresina Tua, the girl violinist, has signed with Alfred Fischof, Turin, for a two years' concert-tour in Europe and America.

Battistini, the barytone, is expected to return to Europe from America at the end of November. (Impossible!—Dr Blidge.)

La Favorita, with Galletti as the heroine, has been performed at the Teatro Dal Verme, Milan.—(Galletti was, years since, at our Royal Italian Opera.—Dr Blidge.)

During September, October, and November, Bianca Lablanche will make an operatic tour through some of the chief towns of Italy, including, among others, Bologne, Florence, and Genoa.

Ricca, present manager of the Teatro Costanzi, Rome, will give in the autumn Verdi's Simon Boccanegra (with the barytone Kaschmann), Ponchielli's Gioconda, and Manzotti's ballet, Sieba.

Theodore Thomas has been taking a holiday at Nantucket, previous to starting on a short tour with his orchestra through some of the States. (How about Bayreuth and Parsifal?—Dr Blidge.)

Massenet will, it is said, visit Berlin, Hamburgh, and Vienna this winter, to superintend the production of his Hérodiade, and to give concerts at which fragments of his oratorios and orchestral suites are to be performed.

All Wagner's ten operas are now being performed in chronological succession at the Stadttheater, Leipsic, where J. v. Witt, Grand-Ducal Chamber-Singer, Schwerin, has been singing.—(which, perhaps, accounts for it.—Dr Blidge.)

Joseph Murphy, of the Lyceum, Philadelphia (U. S.), will bring out the new opera by W. S. Gilbert and Arthur Sullivan, at the beginning of next season, simultaneously with its production at the Globe Theatre, Boston, the Standard Theatre, New York, and a theatre (to be named) in England.

SUNSET.*

As sinking slowly in the west
We mark the setting sun,
Our hearts with holy awe imprest
Towards Thee, Almighty One.

Those beauteous tints of splendour bright,
First crimson and then gold,
Then soft'ning to a mellow light,
What charms do they unfold!

In the world's history's earliest page
We read of setting sun,
Of Him who Heav'n's sceptre sways,
God the Almighty One.

And as we watch these beauteous rays,
So soft and yet so gay,
Let us ne'er fail our God to praise
By night as well by day.

EMILY JOSEPHS.

GERMAN OPERA, DRURY LANE.—On Saturday night Tristan und Isolde was given for the second time, and has not been since repeated. The second performance was even better than the first, which, bearing in mind the extraordinary difficulty involved in the task, reflects credit upon all engaged in its accomplishment, from Herr Richter, the admirable conductor, and his leading actors (singers they can in this instance hardly be called, little or nothing that is vocal being put down for them), to the members of his orchestra without exception. Madame Rosa Sucher's Isolde is so ideal an embodiment of Wagner's poetical conception that we cannot but sympathize with the arduous exertions necessitated by her desire to impart as much musical as dramatic significance to the character, an attempt which—the melodious phrases, such as they are, being almost exclusively given to the orchestra—lies barely within range of the possible. Her performance, nevertheless, is in all respects noteworthy, meriting to the furthest extent the eulogies that have been bestowed upon it. With a Tristan like Herr Winkelmann, the lady is thoroughly well mated. He too possesses a just right to indulgent consideration, the music he has to declaim, often, indeed, to vociferate, being no less exacting and no less ungrateful than that assigned to his gifted partner. Here, again, whatever can be admitted to represent "melody" devolves upon the various instruments of the orchestra—the members of which, it must be admitted, are equal to every emergency. At times, indeed, we are almost reconciled to the strange fact that the orchestral instruments virtually wrest from the mouths of the singers those emotional utterances which have hitherto been the exclusive prerogative of the dramatis personæ on the stage, who thus being robbed of all chance of expressing themselves in musical accents, might with equal effect exhibit in dumb show. That this reduces what is called "opera" to a sheer absurdity need scarcely be added. It is Wagner's theory, however, which in Tristan und Isolde, where the subordinate characters are treated in precisely the same manner as the leading personages, is wrought out to its extremest limits. It behoves, therefore, all who take an interest in the matter to consider this theory with earnest sincerity. In our own opinion, shared by the great majority of those who love music for music's sake, its successful development would lead to the annihilation of one of the most beautiful and healthful forms of Art. Happily, there is small likelihood of such an undesirable result—a new Wagner not being likely to spring up for a century or thereabouts.

So remarkable a series of performances as those of the German Opera at Drury Lane, which terminated last night with another representation of the Meistersinger, are entitled to a brief retrospect, which must be deferred till our next issue.—Graphic.

"This work for educational purposes will be found of inestimable value, since it is one of the very few which confines itself to the cultivation of the middle of the voice; and whilst the phrases are admirably adapted to develop the breathing powers and volume of the voice, the melodies are so exquisitely harmonized that they must prove of great benefit in the improvement of the taste and ear of a student in singing."—Pictorial World.

DR. STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

"Miss Albrecht is not only a pianist of remarkable power and ability but a composer of very elegant music for her 'instrument de prédilection.' This spirited 'Martial Fantasia,' in G major, boldly asserts its title, and is indeed a stirring effusion, that might be made effective, in score, for a military band. The piece is no child's play, but will require study. The staccato octave passages alone supply work for fire-eating players."—"Musical Standard," May, 1882.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

Mons. Aug. Challamel J. Chantepie, author of the book of Velleda, cannot be charged with over-estimating his faculty of invention. He mistrusted it altogether when essaying the work in question, and seems to have determined that a road to success shorter and safer than that of original effort lay in altering, more or less slightly, the production of another man. His choice fell upon Norma, and Velleda is Norma with variations. The reader may amuse himself, as we sketch M. Chantepie's story, by comparing it with MM. Soumet and Belmontet's well-known libretto.

The scene is laid in Gaul, what time the Roman forces under Cœlius are masters and oppressors there. Gaul, represented by a select deputation of inhabitants, is mourning its fate in a picturesque manner on the sea shore, and waiting the return of the priestess Velleda, who has gone over to the Isle of Sein to pray and consult an oracle. Meanwhile, Teuter, a warrior, tries to cheer up his countrymen. We learn that he "secretly aspires to Velleda," and do not marvel at his confidence in the power of the priestess to set matters right. The crowd are just swerving round to his way of thinking when Cœlius, attended by his slave Even, appears on the scene. Cœlius is also enamoured of Velleda—who, ignorant of his rank, loves him in return—and has come disguised as a native in order to be near her. The jealous eye of Teuter soon detecting him, it would, perhaps, go hard with the defenceless Consul but for the entrance of Ina, Velleda's attendant, with the priestesses who had accompanied their mistress to the island. Ina has to say that Velleda remains behind for further prayer, since the oracle is not propitious. Cœlius calls her words a "woeful proclamation," but mourning Gaul takes heart of hope, and proposes to carry heaven by storm. "Let's pray, and with fervent oration E'en the wrath of the gods we may quell." Hereupon this primitive "Salvation Army" departs to wrestle with the fates. Ina would go likewise, but Teuter detains her, declares the identity of Cœlius, hints at a plot, and exits with the Druidess to concoct it. Left alone with his master, Even frankly points out the hopelessness of the Roman's love. Cœlius, however, cannot see it, and is still contemplative of "bliss" and "treasure" when Ina reappears to develop Teuter's scheme. It is simple enough, and could hardly have been original in those days. Will the Consul meet Velleda by night "at yonder rock that bodes ill to the sails?" "Oh joy! oh rapture!" responds the lover; the thing is as good as done, and the act ends with the appearance of Velleda, who informs the Gauls that at a fitting moment she will communicate the behest of the gods. The second act opens upon a gathering of Gallic warriors in a thunderstorm. Undaunted, the soldiers hail the uproar, and fiercely respond as Velleda stirs within them a thirst for Roman blood. Having taken a lot of murderous oaths, and sung a war-hymn, the forces exeunt, leaving Ina and her Druidesses to build a beacon signal of revolt on the very rock named as Velleda's place of assignation. Thither soon comes the deluded Roman, seeking the priestess. Vainly does Even appear, to warn his master of danger. He refuses to run away, and speedily finds himself a captive to the Gauls, who are about putting him to death, when Velleda intervenes. Heaven will accept no blood that has been unfairly shed. The Gauls protest, but the priestess remains firm, much more when she learns that her lover and oppressor of her country are one and the same. So, amid scowls and nervous clutching of weapons, the Roman departs; while Velleda adroitly calls for a repetition of the war-hymn, and restores everybody's good humour. In the interval between the second and third acts the revolt has been put down to such purpose that all the Gauls we know are prisoners, compelled to witness in chains the rejoicings of their conquerors. Cœlius now proves that he can be generous. Remembering the mercy shown him, he would release his captives, but is turned from his purpose by the insults of Teuter. Fortunately, Velleda—who seems to be ever at hand in the interests of personal, if not national, concord—rushes upon the scene, and demands a private talk with the Consul. She has to tell that, conquered by love for him, country, father, and duty have been forsaken. A long and passionate scene follows, which ends as a messenger from Rome is announced. The Tribune bears Cæsar's command to exterminate the Gauls, but Cœlius, inspired by love, defies even his imperial master, and the act ends amid general uproar with the liberation of the prisoners. At the opening of the last act we find Velleda with her father, Sénon, dwelling in an Armorican village. Their retreat has been discovered by Cœlius, who presently appears, still attended by Even. Ample reason for suspecting the sex of the slave has heretofore been given, but now, stung to the quick by jealousy, not only womanhood is declared, but love for the master so devotedly served. That love, rejected, turns at once to hate, and is the agent which brings about catastrophe. Cœlius and Velleda meet to dream of securing happiness by flight at the moment when Even is betraying them to the Gauls. The rest is soon told. Discovered, reproached, condemned, Velleda stabs herself, Cœlius follows her example, and the curtain comes down upon their death.

Without insisting upon the parallelism of Velleda and Norma—which, indeed, would be superfluous—we may point out that M. Chantepie's alterations are not entirely changes for the better, save in so far as they satisfy the exigencies of French grand opera. The demand of that form of entertainment for spectacular effect is, no doubt, amply met; the gathering of the Gallic host, and the festive pomp of the Roman victors, to say nothing of other scenes, liberally regaling the sense of sight. All this, however, is but appendage to drama, and we come to a matter of greater importance in noticing that the Pollio (Cœlius) of Velleda is a real hero by comparison with him of Norma. There contemptible, the amorous Roman here commands our admiration by generosity and faithfulness worthy of such tribute in fullest meed. Otherwise, the two related plays cannot be compared without damage to the younger. Only one situation in Velleda is dramatically powerful, and that occurs at the end of the second act, where the Priestess, by the force of her supremacy, arrests the uplifted weapons of her countrymen, and escorts the Roman harmless through a murderous throng. A genuine effect is here, and it brings down the curtain upon "sensation." For the rest, we have nothing equivalent to those great moments in Norma—when the Priestess threatens the lives of her children, only to find maternal love stronger than revenge; when she learns the faithlessness of Pollio, and when she makes a revelation that can only lead to death. Turning from an inevitable comparison, points are discovered which challenge criticism for themselves alone. Such is the entrance of the leading character, to do nothing, at a time when the interest of the first act is virtually over. It seems as though the librettist had forgotten his heroine till the last moment, and then thrust her on the stage simply to show herself. Exception may also be taken to the feeble individuality displayed by personages whose functions in the drama are important. Ina, though prominent, is but a sketch; Teuter is almost unintelligible; and Senon nearly undiscernable, while Even's dramatic value in the final scene is set off by the slave's superfluousness throughout three acts. As lyric dramas go, however, we are far from sure that all faults are not outweighed by the librettist's regard for the exigencies of opera as an entertainment simply. He has brought in his processions, dances, war scenes, festive scenes, and so forth in sufficient abundance and at the right moment, and he has taken care not to make demands upon the mental resources of his audience. For our own part, we can forgive much on account of the comparative purity of his stage. In Velleda nobody is poisoned or drugged; there is no sensuality; and a Deux ex machinâ always checks murderous tendencies. We grant the double suicide, but a lover in killing himself "most gallantly for love," gives incontestable proof of mental derangement.

M. Lenepveu's music has certain well-marked features which it is only necessary to point out in order to make detailed criticism superfluous. Among its merits may be counted the showing of a cultured mind and facile hand. We say cultured, not imaginative or inventive, since there is no proof in the opera that M. Lenepveu possesses imagination or invention in any marked degree. Cultured he certainly is, the music being, for the most part, that of a man who has studied his craft to good purpose, and made himself proficient. It would seem that the composer determined to utilize this form of strength as much as possible. In a score of ways he makes his musicianship prominent, and even takes the unusual step of closing the third act with a regular choral fugue on a diatonic subject in Handelian style. The fugue, it is true, is not worked out as it might be for the organ, but it indicates a satisfactory command over a strictly scholastic application of musical means. Elsewhere, as in the chorus "A predir" of the first act, M. Lenepveu presents us with that which is essentially an illustration of part-song form, and does so with very good effect. Turning to the orchestra, the scoring, save in the noisy ensembles, is found to be equally suggestive of musicianship. It is delicate and refined, often highly coloured and picturesque, and always suggestive of acquaintance with and regard for instrumental characteristics. Only when we rise into the higher range of the creative musician are evidences of weakness discoverable. As the composer of a grand opera, M. Lenepveu may "assume the god; affect to nod; and seem to shake the spheres," but connoisseurs certainly are not deceived. They cannot be blind to the composer's liberal abstraction from the storehouse of his memory that which, in substance, Meyerbeer, Gounod, and others have a right to call their own. Here and there M. Lenepveu does not affect disguise, but condescends to bold imitation, as when, for example, he accompanies the voice in an unmistakable Meyerbeer passage with a single bass clarinet. If it be said that a man does well to draw upon a stored memory rather than a poor invention we quite agree. Originality is no merit per se: nevertheless, when it is wanting, certain inferences are as fair as inevitable. Failing the ideality which is at the bottom of true musical inventiveness, and where memory does not serve, M. Lenepveu takes one of two courses. That is to say, he either resorts to a novel musical mechanism, or covers up everything with noise. The modern French school is great at unfamiliar scales and rhythms, behind which many of its disciples seek to hide their essential poverty. Let us add, that the modern French school is by no means alone as to this matter. At present, however, we have to do with one of its representatives, who cannot be denied the credit of turning to good account the resources just indicated. A certain piquancy always results from the use of a Greek "mode," or the employment of rhythms such as those used in several of M. Lenepveu's airs. The best devices of this kind, however, cannot atone for lack of ideas, any more than a service of gold plate can make up for poor and scanty food. To the noisy ensembles we need not particularly advert, especially as the temptation from which they spring is great. Music nowadays becomes more and more an affair of noise, and the most uproarious piece in Velleda was the only one encored on Tuesday night. It was also the most commonplace. But, after all is said, we must admit that Velleda suits the average audience of Italian opera—an audience that asks simply for entertainment. It is tuneful from beginning to end? a great part is pleasing because refined; and it represents a frank, if somewhat adventurous effort to write a grand opera free from the baneful pretences and the transcendental absurdities of the new German school. An opera new and not excruciating should this season be as exempt as a gift horse from a particular form of examination.

The performance, ably conducted by M. Dupont, need not long detain us, since there was an absence both of marked general excellence and particular want of it, a fair Italian opera average being presented. Mdme Patti impersonated Velleda with quiet power throughout, and sang with more than usual intensity of expression where an unwonted demand was made upon her. Owing to the absence of bravura music, Mdme Patti's most telling vocal means were kept in abeyance, but she made up for this, in the judgment of connoisseurs at least, by displaying qualities of higher artistic worth. Her triumph was indisputable. As Ina, Mdme Valleria once more asserted her value as an able and conscientious artist. In her best voice, she sang admirably; while her acting gave interest to a character not in itself qualified to command attention. Mdlle Stahl did all that was possible for the part of Even; Signor Nicolini, as Cœlius, looked the Roman commander to the life; Signor Cotogni (Teuter), M. Dauphin (Tribune), and Signor de Reszké (Senon), carefully performing the tasks respectfully assigned to them. More than a word of praise was deserved by both chorus and orchestra, while the mise-en-scène reflected much credit upon the stage manager, M. Lapissida.—D. T.

De Lange, junr., has been giving organ concerts in the churches of Rotterdam, Voorburg, the Hague, Utrecht, and Amsterdam.

BERLIN.—In the fourth character assumed by Schröder-Hanfstängl at the Royal Operahouse, that of Marguerite in Gounod's Faust, she did not please as much as in the other parts she has sustained here.—The soprano, Gambogi, lately engaged for the Italian company at the Skating Rink, being afterwards refused an appearance on the ground of incompetence, has brought an action against the manager. Meantime, Engel, of Kroll's Theatre, on hearing the opinion of fair judges, gave her an opportunity of vindicating her professional character, which she has effectually done as Gilda and Amina.—The operatic season, under Firmans, at the Louisenstädtisches Theater, prospers.

FRANKFORT-ON-THE-MAINE.—Joachim Raff, for some years Director of the Hoch Conservatory here, died suddenly in the night of Sunday the 25th ult. He was born on the 27th May, 1822, at Lachen, on the shores of the Lake of Zurich, and originally intended for a schoolmaster. "But," says the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung, "the love of music drove learning into the background, and the encouragement he received from Mendelssohn and Liszt helped very much to win him over entirely to art. He resided most of his life in Wiesbaden. Simple, however, as was his mode of existence, it was prolific, as every one knows, in musical creations of all kinds; there is, perhaps, no form of composition in which Joachim Raff was not an active labourer, and we need not here emphasize the fact that he did very important work in each. His name is for ever assured of a place in the temple of musical history. Honour to his memory!" The Leipsic Signale says: "In many branches—in opera, with König Alfred; with ten symphonies and dozens of sonatas, trios, songs, and fantasias—he was unceasingly enriching the stock of our music publishers. His greatest successes were achieved with his symphonies, Leonore and Im Walde. He married Doris Genast (Weimar)."

GERMAN OPERA AT DRURY LANE.—The series of performances of German opera closed on Friday evening with a repetition of Die Meistersinger. The season began on May 18 with Wagner's Lohengrin, which was followed by Der Fliegende Holländer, Tannhäuser, Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg, and Tristan und Isolde, first heard among us in the original language, the two last-named for the first time here on the stage. Events of higher artistic interest were the production of Beethoven's Fidelio and Weber's Euryanthe, both of which had been formerly given here by German companies many years ago. The large predominance of Wagner's music over that of classical masters is a feature of the past scheme that may well be reconsidered in the arrangements for similar performances next year; and it will also be a matter of simple justice to bestow as much care on Weber's masterpiece as was bestowed on all the other performances, the general excellence of which has been recognized. The factitious effect given to Wagner's works by the fine declamation and acting of the principal artists must have struck all dispassionate hearers and spectators as an advantage to which the so-called poet-composer was immensely indebted. Special tribute is due to the admirable performances of Frau Sucher, Fräulein Malten, Fräulein Brandt, Herr Winkelmann, Herr Gura, Herr Kraus, Herr Ehrke, Herr Koegel, and the artists who undertook subordinate parts. The excellence of the band and chorus, the skilful conducting of Herr Richter, and Herr Armbruster's efficient superintendence of the chorus, were also valuable features. The general result of the enterprise leads to a widespread desire for its recurrence next year, with a leaning to the side of mercy as regards the quantity of Wagnerism, the dose of which during the past season—at Drury Lane and Her Majesty's Theatre—has been far beyond the bounds of moderation. The ardent disciples of Wagner may have settled, to their own, and to his satisfaction, his supremacy over Mozart, Beethoven, Weber—to say nothing of other composers hitherto supposed to be worthy of recognition; but whether the large musical public will coincide with that judgment is more than doubtful.—Daily News.

CHOISY-LE-ROI.—A statue of Rouget de Lisle, author of the "Marseillaise," who died here in June, 1836, and was buried in the cemetery, will be inaugurated on the 29th inst. It is erected in one of the principal squares. The Government will be officially represented on the occasion.

SCRAPS FROM PARIS.

Virgil's words: "Vires acquirit eundo," may fairly be applied to Françoise de Rimini, which, despite the disappearance from the cast of Lassalle, who has gone for a rest to Le Pornichet in Brittany, increases in popularity at the Grand Opera, and draws better houses than ever. Lassalle is succeeded as Malatesta by Melchissédec, who will retain possession of the character up to the 14th inst., when the departure of Mdlles Salla, Richard, and Mauri, will necessitate the withdrawal of M. Ambroise Thomas's work till next September. The public who had assembled for the 22nd performance on the 30th ult. were kept waiting an hour after the usual time for admission, owing to an explosion of gas in one of the cloak-rooms on the fifth tier. The person in charge had neglected to turn off one of the burners, hence the accident. Luckily not much damage was done, though, had the explosion occurred at some other time, the theatre might have been burnt to the ground. Mad. Krauss has gone to pay a visit to her family in Vienna, where she will spend most of her three months' holiday. She took her leave in Les Huguenots. The gap caused in the company by her absence has been filled up by Mad. Montalba, who made her re-appearance in Aïda. Mdlle Rita Sangalli, likewise, has bid a temporary farewell to her admirers, choosing for the purpose the ballet of Namouna. She has gone to her villa at Deauville and will not return before October, when she will open in Sylvia. There is some talk of afterwards reproducing for her Léo Delibes' Source. On the 28th ult., Donizetti's Favorite was revived with Mdlle Richard and Maurel in the two leading parts. M. Salvayre's ballet of Fandango, with Mdlle Subra as Carmencita, also saw the footlights again after a considerable interval.—M. Villaret will retire definitively in October. His place will be taken by M. Salomon. Miss Griswold has notified to M. Vaucorbeil her intention of not renewing her engagement, which terminates in the autumn. She intends exchanging the French for the Italian lyric stage. Another fair American, Miss Nordica, on the contrary, has deserted Italy for France, and is now rehearsing the part of Marguerite in Ch. Gounod's Faust.—M. Eugène Lacoste is in London, whither he has been despatched by M. Vaucorbeil to consult the authorities and works on the costumes for M. Saint-Saëns' Henri VIII. This was to have been followed by a two-act opera, with music by M. Pessard, but, owing to some difficulty connected with the libretto, the first novelty after Henri VIII. will be the new ballet, La Farandole, music by M. Théodore Dubois, book by MM. Gille and Mortier, assisted choregraphically by M. L. Mérante. The scene is laid near Arles in the 15th century, and the principal character is destined for Mdlle Mauri. Then will come a new opera, provisionally entitled Montalto, the music for which M. Massenet has engaged, by an agreement duly signed and sealed, to deliver by the 1st April, 1883. The libretto is by MM. Detroyat and Sylvestre. The cast will probably include Mdme Krauss, MM. Lassalle, Sellier, and Gailhard.

The Opéra Comique closed on the 1st inst., after an exceptionally successful season, with a performance of Le Nozze, which drew 9,200 francs, the receipts on the evening previous, with Méhul's Joseph, amounting to upwards of 5,000. Both these works have proved great hits. Méhul's score, indeed, which M. Carvalho revived on the 5th inst., is, perhaps, better appreciated now by the general public than it was at its first production on the 17th February, 1807, when Mdme Gavaudan played Benjamin; Elleviou, Joseph; Solié, Jacob; and Gavaudan, Simeon. The tenors Paul and Huet afterwards attempted the part of Joseph, but made nothing of it. Ponchard scored a success in it at the Opéra-Comique in 1851, and Capoul was its representative at the same theatre in 1865. On the present occasion the character was entrusted to M. Talazac, who acquitted himself exceedingly well. Mdme Bilbaut-Vauchelet was a charming Benjamin. M. Cobalet, comparatively unknown when the curtain went up, found next day that his impersonation of Jacob had put him in a fair way of becoming famous. He possesses a splendid bass voice, which he uses most effectively. The orchestra went well under M. Danbé, and the same is true of the chorus, thanks to the careful training of M. Carré.—The re-opening of the theatre in the autumn will probably be signalized by the production of two one-act trifles, La Nuit de Saint-Jean and Battez Philidor, the composer in the first instance being M. Lacome, and in the second M. Dutacq. Another work of like Lilliputian proportions, Le Fermier de Franconville, discovered recently among Félicien David's papers, will, also, it is said, be performed at the Salle Favart. M. Léo Delibes has not only completed and sent in the MS. of his Lakmé, destined to be the great feature of next season, but, after the book had been read by the author, M. Goudinet, to the artists convened to hear it in the green-room, he played the music through on the piano. Everyone, it seems, was delighted, notably Mdlle Vanzandt, MM. Talazac, Cobalet, and Barré, to whom are entrusted the leading characters. It was M. Carvalho's intention to have included Carmen in his repertory next season, with Lhérie, as usual, in the part of Don José, his original creation. But all the worthy manager's plans have been deranged by a thoroughly unexpected incident, namely, the transformation of Lhérie from a tenor into a barytone, which took place while the artist was singing last winter at Genoa. Under the circumstances, Lhérie requested to be released from his engagement at the Salle Favart, and his request was granted, but with the express stipulation that, if ever he becomes a tenor again, he is bound, under all sorts of penalties, to resume his position in M. Carvalho's company, which, by the way, will no longer count among its members next season Mdmes Bilbaut-Vauchelet, Jacob, MM. Nicot, Furst, Fugere, and Piccaluga.

M. Vidal, following in the footsteps of M. Leroy, whose secretary he was, is making another effort to establish a "Popular Opera" at the Théâtre du Château d'Eau. He inaugurated his season with Si j'étais Roi, after which came Il Barbiere.—Le Journal de Musique has ceased to appear; La Musique Populaire has passed into other hands, M. Arthur Pougin, however, remaining editor; and a new paper, L'Univers Musical, has been started.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—Having seen his Teutonic rivals safely out of the country, Mr Gye, last (Tuesday) night, preferred a claim upon the attention of amateurs by producing Velleda, an opera seria in four acts, the work of M. Charles Lenepveu. The composer is a gentleman hitherto unknown to fame—a fact the more remarkable because he might say—quoting the late Mr Thackeray—having long ago entered upon artistic life, amid all the advantages that training at the Paris Conservatoire could secure. Genius, however, is a wayward thing; and the prize of opportunity can only be drawn from a "lucky bag" in which there are many blanks. Perhaps M. Lenepveu has developed late; or it may be that, like Dvorak, who lived two score years before recognition came, his talent called and no man regarded. Whether or not he deserves the good fortune of a Covent Garden hearing is a question we shall discuss more at leisure; but it may be said at once that Velleda, happy in the co-operation of such artists as Mdme Patti, Mdme Valleria, Mdlle Stahl, Signors Cotogni and de Reszké, obtained a favourable reception, while a considerable proportion of a full house remained till the curtain fell some time after midnight.—D. T. (July 5).

"And here I am at forty year Dipping my nose in the Gascon wine,"

MENDELSSOHN'S SYMPHONY IN A MAJOR.—The mighty doings that have distinguished the present and the past week in London have not been able to extinguish the pleasure of the Saturday afternoons at the Crystal Palace, and the twenty-fourth concert attracted on Saturday last a large audience. Whether it is that we have of late heard so much "advanced music" that the return to the intelligible was doubly agreeable, or whether it is that the brightness of spring had invigorated both orchestra and audience, it is difficult to decide, but the truth was manifest that Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony appeared to be, on this occasion, full of freshness, breathing the open air, the blue sky, and the sweet blossoms of June. Opening the concert, each movement came like some well-loved friend, from whom we had been parted; it was all joy and thankfulness. Every movement brought a welcome in its hand, and the "Pilgrim's March" (why so-called none can explain) roused the audience to appreciate one of the most original and charming pieces of melody ever written. But it is needless to single out portions of this work; all, even to the last movement (saltarello), was agreeable to the audience and appropriate to the season of the year, being full of the loving spirit of the composer.—PHOSPHOR (Brighton Guardian, June 10th.)

ROBERT LE DIABLE IN BERLIN.

It was fifty years on the 20th June last since Robert le Diable was first brought out in the Prussian capital. The event was anticipated with great curiosity. The reports from London and Paris concerning the performances in those places contributed to raise public expectation. The Paris mise-en-scène, so the papers stated, cost a hundred thousand francs; this was true, but they should have added that, despite the words in Scribe's text to the effect that gold is nothing more than a chimæra, the first twelve performances brought in upwards of one hundred and twenty thousand. Marie Taglioni, who happened to be fulfilling a short engagement in Berlin at the time, appeared on the first night as the Abbess Helena. The work, translated by Th. Hell, was arranged for the Operahouse by Baron von Lichtenstein. The composer was requested by Herr G. A. Schneider (father of Louis Schneider), head of the orchestra and all the members, to conduct the opera himself, which he did. He had a call at the end of the third act, and when, after considerable delay, he responded to it, was received with enthusiasm. The principal characters were thus cast: Isabella, Mad. Seidler; Alice, Mdlle von Schätzell (now Mad. von Decker, wife of the Chief Printer to the Court); Robert, Herr Bader; Bertram, Herr Blume; Raimbaut, Herr Mantius. The newspapers published very exhaustive notices, the critics confessing that they had to do with a work of genius. "It is a production," said the critic of the Berlin paper, Der Freimuthige, "which, by originality of invention and clever realization, founds a new era in dramatic music, and exhibits Meyerbeer as the first of living romantic composers."

BALFE.

England has produced so few composers who have obtained European reputation that she cannot, for her own sake, neglect the fame of a musician like the late Michael Balfe, known by a certain number of his operas throughout the civilized world. Why, immediately after his death, no place was found for his remains in the Abbey has never been made clear. Without now entering upon that question, it is gratifying to think that his well-founded claims to posthumous honours have been at last recognized, and that, thanks to the sympathetic appreciation of Dean Bradley, a tablet to his memory is now on the point of being put up in Westminster Abbey. If it be true that "the verdict of contemporary foreigners is the verdict of posterity," Balfe will not soon be forgotten; and some few of his operas will long be held in esteem. In the United States many of his works have been as popular as in England itself; and several of them have been performed with success, not only in all the English speaking countries, but also in Italy, France, Germany, Spain, and Russia. It was in Italy, indeed, that Balfe began his career at once as a composer and a singer; and long before his name had been heard in England he already enjoyed considerable celebrity in what at that time deserved really to be called the "Land of Song." Rossini was then the great composer of Italy, and it was as Figaro in the immortal Barbiere that Balfe made his first great success as a singer, obtaining in that exacting, but by no means ungrateful part, the approbation, not only of Italian audiences, but also and above all, of Rossini himself. It did not say much for the English musical public of the day that an artist of Balfe's excellence should be obliged, in seeking a field for the display of his talents, to look abroad. But the same thing might and doubtless would happen even now in the case of a vocalist bent on distinguishing himself in opera, there seeming to be even less chance now than there was in Balfe's time of an operahouse for English singers and English composers being permanently established in England. Fortunately for him, Balfe possessed not only talent but also energy; and, taking advantage of one of those spasmodic attempts to set English opera on foot, which are at least valuable as revealing a constantly recurring tendency towards a particular object, he succeeded in getting produced in London a lyrical work which, under the title of The Siege of Rochelle, achieved remarkable success. Paraphrasing the famous dictum of Louis XIV., Balfe might at this time, if not throughout his career, have said that English opera was himself—"L'Opéra c'est moi"—and it did indeed seem to consist, for practical purposes, of any dramas which Balfe happened to set to music. It would be incorrect to say absolutely of Balfe that in his operas the whole of our dramatic music is summed up. But it was only during the musical period which he dominated that English opera seemed to possess a certain vitality; and with him the history of English opera, as a modern product, begins and ends.

It is by The Bohemian Girl, so rich in simple, rhythmical, tuneful strains that Balfe a few years hence will be known; and already that has come to be looked upon as his one opera—even as Maritana is the one thoroughly well-known opera by Wallace, and The Lily of Killarney the one thoroughly well-known opera by Benedict. Balfe, however, like the two composers just named, produced a great number of works; more even than Benedict, and many more than Wallace. To estimate the merit of a creative artist by his fertility alone, would, of course, be a mistake. To do so, would be to place the prolific Donizetti above all the masters of his time, if not of any time;* while, among dramatic poets, it would give the prize to Lope de Vega in preference to Shakspere. But a faculty for production is not, all the same, to be undervalued. It has been allowed by a high authority to be a point in favour of the crab-tree that, though it only produces crab apples, it at least produces them in large numbers; and the tuneful, singable operas of Balfe cannot certainly be likened to the fruit of the crab-tree. Nor was the fruit of his genius of one and the same kind. It was, on the contrary, full of variety; and he possessed the talent of suiting himself to the taste of whatever nation he happened to be addressing. While giving operas indirectly to all Europe he furnished them in a direct manner to Italy, France and England. Moro, otherwise Pittore e Duca, may be taken as a specimen of the numerous works contributed by Balfe to the Italian stage. Falstaff, an Italian Opera composed by Balfe forty years ago for the London public, was first produced at the establishment now known as Her Majesty's Theatre. He wrote Le Puits d'Amour and Les Quatre fils d'Aymon for the Opera Comique of Paris, and L'Etoile de Seville for the Grand Opera of the same capital; and from England, France, and Italy his works have made their way to every country in Europe where animated and thoroughly singable dramatic music is appreciated. It would have been strange if, sooner or later, justice had not been done to him in his own country; and it is really as an act of justice that the recognition now accorded to him must be viewed.—Morning Post, June 24.

THE NATIONAL ANTHEM FOR INDIA.

SIR,—The people of India, taken collectively, are well satisfied, as they have very good reason to be, with the British administration of their country. I only repeat what I have heard said in the Courts of native Princes, and by native statesmen of experience and observation, that, under the protection of England, India enjoys repose and prosperity such as was never experienced in Asia at any former time. All classes of the people there know and feel this; and I think that the introduction of the anthem into India in all the principal dialects would help the different races to give utterance to the feelings of loyalty which they entertain towards the rule and person of the British Sovereign. By degrees it may reach the lower classes, and express for them their attachment to the benign influence which presides over the destinies of the Empire. I am glad to observe that the names of many eminent and experienced personages are already identified with this movement, and that the hymn is to be sent to the different races of India as a present from the people of Great Britain. I have no hesitation in saying that, going in this shape, it will be cheerfully accepted in the same spirit in which it is offered.

The introduction of the National Anthem into India would for another reason be advantageous. For some years past attempts have been made in different parts of the country to raise Indian music to its former status, and with that view to introduce musical notation. Raja Sourindro Mohun Tagore in Calcutta, and Mr K. N. Kabrajee, well known in Bombay for his dramatic and musical talent, have been endeavouring, years past, to revive the departed glory of Indian music; and the project in question, if acted upon, would furnish an excellent opportunity for these attempts to be concentrated, and so, perhaps, mark an era of regeneration of what was once a real and richly cultivated art.—Yours obediently,

MANCHERJEE M. BHOWNAGGREE.

(From the "Graphic.")

The death of this prolific composer, who, although he had passed the age of sixty, was still actively engaged in the production of new works, would call for more than a passing notice had we the necessary space at disposal. Raff, if not a genius, was a marvel of productivity. To judge by the number of his compositions, and the length and comparative importance of many of them, he could have enjoyed little cessation from labour. Such men are only possible in Germany; and in no other country, perhaps, would a ready market for their productions be found. Scarcely a branch of musical composition, from opera and orchestral symphony to the popular Lied, was left untouched by Raff; but the rapidity with which he committed work after work to paper allowed him scant leisure to re-consider and re-touch, so that a vast deal that came from his pen carries little more weight with it than belongs to easy improvisation. His facility indeed was fatal to his chances of immortality; and it would be difficult to point with assured conviction to any of his most ambitious efforts as likely to survive him for a lengthened period; and this, among other reasons, because, despite his fecundity, he had no marked individuality—no style, in short, of his own. Some of his larger orchestral productions have been introduced by Mr Manns at the Crystal Palace, and received with considerable favour; but none of them can be said to have left an indelible impression, their diffuseness being rarely condoned (as with Schubert) by beauty and originality of ideas. Raff, first influenced by Mendelssohn, who took much interest in his early career, was, after the death of that truly great and "classical" musician, drawn into the vortex of Liszt, subsequently becoming an ardent worshipper of Wagner, with reference to whose teachings, more than a quarter of a century ago, he published a brochure, entitled "The Wagner Question" (Die Wagnerfrage), which has deservedly passed into oblivion. Born at Lachen (German Switzerland), and educated at the Schwyz Jesuit Lyceum, his fixed residence for many years was Wiesbaden on the Rhine, where he composed the greater number of his best known works, and among them the pianoforte quintet (in A minor), the two pianoforte trios (in C minor and G major), the sonata for piano and violin (in D major), &c., which Mr Arthur Chappell has on several occasions produced at the "Popular Concerts." Some four or five years ago Raff accepted the office of "Principal" at Dr Hoch's new Academy in Frankfort-on-the-Maine, where Mdme Schumann also was Professor. As a man he was universally respected, and his death will cause earnest and general regret among the circles in which he moved.

ANOTHER theatre was burnt to the ground on Thursday evening—the "Recreo," in Madrid.

BUCHAREST (from a correspondent).—The marriage of Miss Bessie Richards seems to be as happy a one as her sincerest well-wishers could have desired. Her husband, who ranks high in an eminent profession, is a favoured guest with the most exclusive circles, while his wife is already recognized, not only on account of her charmingly attractive personality but of her varied accomplishments, as one of the ornaments of Bucharest society. This alone would suffice to console her English friends for her absence.

As you perceive, my dear Madam, I hereby certify to you the complete victory of Judaism on all sides; and, if I now once more openly express my feelings on the subject, I really do not do so under the impression that I can in any way impair the completeness of the said victory. As, on the other hand, my description of the course pursued by this peculiar fact in the development of the German mind, seems to prove that this is the result of the agitation excited among the Jews by my former article, you may perhaps, feel inclined to ask, full of astonishment, why by my challenge I have provoked this agitation in the shape of reaction?

I might excuse myself by saying that I was induced to make this attack, not by considering the "causa finalis," but simply by the impulse of the "causa efficiens" (as philosophers express it). It is certain that when writing and publishing the first article the last thing in my mind was the thought of still opposing with any chance of success the influence of the Jews upon our music; even then I perceived so clearly the reasons of their previous victories, that, at the present moment, after a lapse of more than eighteen years, it is to a certain extent a source of satisfaction for me to be able, by the republication of my article, to prove this. What I wanted to effect by it, I could not clearly state; I could, on the contrary, merely plead the fact that the discernment of the inevitable decay of our musical affairs imposed on me the inward necessity of pointing out its causes. Perhaps, however, I felt a desire to combine also a hopeful assumption; this is revealed to you by the concluding adjuration of the article, an adjuration with which I appeal to the Jews themselves.

Just as the humane friends of the church considered a healthy reform of it might be effected by invoking the aid of the oppressed lower clergy, I, too, took into account the great gifts of heart as well as of mind which had come under my own cognizance, really refreshing me, from out the circle of Jewish society. I am certainly, also, of opinion, that everything proceeding thence and oppressing the German element properly so called, bears, in a far more fearful degree, on the Jew himself, when full of heart and mind. It strikes me that I once perceived signs that my appeal had called forth comprehension and profound excitement. If dependence in any position is a great evil and obstacle to free development, the dependence of the Jews on each other appears a serf-like misfortune of the most extreme harshness. No doubt, a great deal is permitted and looked over, in the case of a clever Jew, since some have resolved to live not only with but into us, by the more enlightened members of his race; the best Jewish anecdotes, which are highly amusing, are related to us about them; and, even in other respects, we are acquainted with some very impartial and consequently seemingly allowable utterances of theirs, both regarding us and themselves. But to protect a person under the ban of their race, must undoubtedly strike the Jews as being a crime worthy of death. It has been my lot to become acquainted with some touching instances of this kind. In order however, to give you an idea of what this tyranny really is, let one case serve for many. An indisputably highly gifted writer of Jewish descent, really full of talent and intelligence, who seems as if he had come to form part and parcel of the most thoroughly German folks-life, and with whom, for a long time, I had, also, much and varied intercourse on the subject of Judaism, subsequently became acquainted with my poetical effusions: Der Ring des Nibelungen, and Tristan und Isolde. He spoke of them with such appreciative warmth and such clear intelligence, that it was not unnatural that those of my friends to whom he had spoken should request him to state publicly his opinion of poems which had been so strikingly ignored by our literary circles. It was impossible for him to do so.

You perceive, my dear Madam, from these hints that if, on the present occasion, I were answering merely your question, regarding the mysterious reason of the persecution directed against me, especially by the press, I should not probably have given this almost fatiguing extension to my answer, unless, even at the present day, I had not been urged thereto by a hope which can certainly be hardly expressed, but which exists in the deepest recesses of my heart. If I wished to find expression for it, I could not allow it to appear as founded upon the continued concealment of my relations towards Judaism; this concealment has contributed to the confusion in which nearly every sympathizing friend of mine finds himself with you. Having, by the pseudonym at first adopted, given cause for this, nay, having even furnished my foes with the strategic means of attacking me, I was now obliged to unveil to my friends that which was only too well known to those foes. If I assume that it is only this openness which, if it does not bring me friends from the hostile camp, may at any rate strengthen them, as well as others, to fight for their own real emancipation, I may, perhaps, be pardoned if a comprehensive thought connected with the history of our civilization veils the nature of an illusion, which spontaneously winds itself into my heart. For on one point I am certain: As the influence which the Jews have obtained over our intellectual life, and, such as it is, manifested in the diversion and deterioration of our highest and most cultivated tendencies, is not a mere, let us say psychological chance, it must be acknowledged as undeniable and decisive. Whether the decay of our culture might be checked by violently casting forth the decomposing foreign element in it, is something I cannot determine, because this would require resources with the existence of which I am unacquainted. But if, on the other hand, the above element is to be so assimilated to us that it shall, together with ourselves, ripen into the higher development of our more noble human qualities; it is evident that it is not by concealing the difficulties attending such an assimilation, but by the most open exposure of them that we can promote our purpose. If a serious impulse towards this end shall have been given by me from within the domain—according to our modern æsthetics, so harmlessly pleasing—of music, this would not appear perhaps unfavourable to my views as to the important destiny of music; and, at all events, my dear Madam, you might find in it an excuse for my having discoursed to you at such length on so seemingly abstruse a theme.

(From the "Buffalo Courier.")

Richard Wagner tells his admirers that Tristan and Isolde marks a step in his progressive march toward the music of the future, and indicates the goal toward which he would carry the musical world at large. Compared with his earliest operas, Rienzi and others, it is very much more intense, and even beside Lohengrin it stands prominent, throwing the other in deep shadow. Wagner has brought all the peculiarities of his own ideas and of the school of which he is the head and centre to bear upon this work, and it is a wonderful, yet objectionable masterpiece. To the world at large, which finds the purity in music and text of Beethoven's beautiful Fidelio the work of a truer man and greater master, Tristan and Isolde but depicts a hideous sentiment encased in every musical accessory by the hand of a cunning workman. To one school of men and women which grows proportionately as we let go our ideas of morality and put out one by one the beacon lights of a Christian religion, Wagner is acceptable; but to all others his influence seems a great evil that will eventually dethrone every high principle that once ruled his people. Such work as his belongs to devils, not men; and if to-day there is a power in Germany that is implanting thoughts of sin and wrong in the hearts of the young men, it is Wagner.

To judge of this most prominent composer and his works, it is necessary to be where his operas are given under his own direction or by those who have been drilled by his hand. We, like many another musical student, have tried to understand him afar off, have read what his musical friends and foes have written, and have acknowledged the species of fascination that appears to surround whatever he does and says. But nothing can convey what Wagner is but the sense of eye and ear, and we know this to-day as we have never known it before. Neither can Wagner be seen in all his evil power outside of his own land, or away from those who learn their art from him. Lohengrin in New York or in London is not Lohengrin in Berlin, Leipsic or Dresden, and if it be so with this opera, it is much more so with Tristan and Isolde. Here there are now no longer scruples of conscience or moral ideas to prevent a composer from doing whatsoever he will, so long as he does not interfere with the politics that support a throne; and Wagner has pressed this advantage to its utmost limit. No deed is sin that does not touch the governmental reign, and when music is thus made the instrument of evil principles, and when the people applaud such a use, it is time to believe that such a public and such a ruler should be blotted from the face of the earth. In speaking thus strongly of the condition of Germany, we do not judge from the circumscribed circles of one or two prominent cities, or from a few crowded and enthusiastic opera-house audiences, but from the general tone of the press. Wagner's opposers do not condemn his texts, except to criticise them as taking unwarrantable liberties with the language as well as the legends upon which they are founded. There is no word of condemnation written against the theories he advances, or upon the sentiments he puts into the actions and words of the men and women he introduces in his operas. These points the critics throughout Germany ignore, and this very fact leads one to suppose that the people see nothing to condemn in the total absence of noble, high-minded principle which Wagner's characters display. The question naturally arises whether morality is as dead in Germany as religion appears to be, and honour a sentiment to be paraded in official reports but not practised in public or private life. It is no wonder that Wagner depicts what he has lived for thirty years and holds it up as a model of what the future has in store for his country. Had the press bade him years ago keep within his own home circle the crimes that he now parades, and each time with more boldness, his latest operas would never have seen the light.

Tristan and Isolde is based upon an old legend, and yet is much changed to meet the requirements of the composer, who himself prepared the text. The opera is virtually a recitative in three acts —there being no choruses of importance—thus giving the two principal characters, Tristan and Isolde, the burden of the whole work. The first scene shows an elegant saloon upon the deck of a ship, where Isolde bemoans the death of her father, a northern king, and the fate which has condemned her to be brought by his destroyer to the land of the monarch under whom Tristan has gone forth to battle. A curtain being drawn shows Tristan upon the deck in command of the troops, and presently before Isolde, to tell her that the king awaits her at the castle prepared to make her his queen. This Isolde ignores in her desire to revenge herself upon Tristan for the death of her father, and such is the power of her reproaches that he draws his sword and bids her kill him. She refuses, but requests him as a pledge of his contrition to drink a cup of wine which she believes to be poisoned, but which her maid has prepared as a "love potion." Tristan obeys her, and she, now in terror of what she has done, drinks what remains in the goblet. Instead of falling dead, both feel the subtle effects of the mysterious drug and stand gazing at each other, evincing only by action the change from intense hatred to love. Isolde finally throws herself upon Tristan's neck, and the scene, an hour and twenty minutes in length, ends. The second act presents the castle at night and Isolde, now the wife of the king, raising a signal. Tristan appears, and their interview, which presents a scene in which Wagner frees himself from every restraint, lasts another hour. There are long pauses where the music supplies the words, and where none but those whose sense of purity is deadened can find pleasure. Upon this scene the king appears, and a courtier, drawing his sword, revenges his monarch's wrongs by wounding Tristan. This tragic dénouement closes the act. The third and last act shows Tristan in his own home lying upon a couch and dying from the effects of the wound. His prayer is to see Isolde, and a faithful attendant assures him that a ship is in sight which will bring her to him. This scene is horribly real, and is given up to a dying man's agony. Just as he feels the hand of death upon him Tristan rises and then falls into the arms of Isolde, who arrives only in time to hear his last word, which is her name. The curtain does not fall here, as might be supposed, for Wagner revels in picturing passionate lament, and the scene is sufficiently harrowing to meet the ideas of all who sympathize with him. Upon this recital of woe, the king comes in pursuit of his faithless queen, but she ignores him, and, after a final avowal of her passion for Tristan, falls dead upon his body.

The three acts are virtually, as we have said, love-scenes between Tristan and Isolde, and there is nothing to distract the attention from these two central figures. In the text there are pages of recitative where not a melodious phrase is played by the orchestra. This text is beautiful, so far as its management is concerned, and it shows the careful hand of a master who wished his ideas to harmonize perfectly. It is very difficult to translate; in fact, as one of the best philologists in the university at Leipsic assured us, it is impossible to give the ideas correctly in any other language. Wagner uses old German and coins words as it suits him, making the libretto as peculiar as his musical setting. This is a noticeable characteristic of the man, and he will trust no other mind to prepare for him the expression of emotions that he must make live in music. He has, it is true, been forced to do this at times, but he now no longer associates with his music anything but his own individuality, and this is very apparent in his later operas. It is, therefore, quite certain that the man Wagner speaks in his works, and from these compositions he wishes to be judged. The world does judge him, but far too leniently, for he has stretched out his hand to do evil instead of good, and used his splendid powers to degrade all who come within his influence. Germany cheers Wagner, but in doing it she upholds what will eventually rob her of even the shred of Christianity and morality left her to-day.

Wagner.

(From "Kunkel's Musical Review.")

Richard Wagner was born in Leipsic, Germany, on the 22nd day of May, 1813. His father, a police magistrate, intended him for the law, but did not seriously oppose his son's inclinations, when at the age of seventeen, he determined to adopt music as a profession, and entered the University as a music student. He left the University at the end of three years, and tried his fortune as a musician in a number of cities of Germany (Warzburg, Königsberg, Dresden, &c.), and then went to Paris, which he left in no very good humour in 1842. Before this, however, he had written Rienzi, and The Flying Dutchman, and soon afterwards wrote Lohengrin, and Tannhäuser, which remain to this day his most popular works. In 1848 he had to flee to Switzerland to avoid prosecution for participation in some revolutionary conspiracy. In the course of his varied experiences, Wagner came to the conclusion that all operas hitherto composed had been composed on a wrong plan. Among other things, he found that music as music had been given too large a place in such works, and in 1849 he gave expression to his views in his pamphlet, The Art Work of the Future, which opened the still unsettled fight between the Wagnerites and the anti-Wagnerites. Wagner himself does not claim to have produced any work which was in all respects faithful to his ideal dramatico-musical truth, until he gave to the world his Tristan und Isolde, first produced in Munich, June 10, 1865. In this opera, which cannot be played in less than five hours, there is not a single aria, not a single chorus, but simply the musical recitative, which he calls melos (though it may be doubted whether the Greeks would call it so). The voices, as he treats them, become, in a sense, instruments which play a part in the symphonic whole, and, musically, are of no more importance than any of the leading instruments of the orchestra. The operas he has since produced conform in that respect to his theories, and none of them, so far, have achieved a genuine success, although put upon the stage with all the magnificence possible. That Wagner has genius none of his intelligent opponents deny, that here and there, in his compositions, there appear magnificent bits of music, they all admit; but they claim that these passages are the very ones in which the musician in Wagner gets the better of his fallacious theories concerning the true office of music. Of his theories, it can be said, in the words of Mr Apthorp:—

"There is no musical principle of his that does not depend upon his art philosophy. In the first place, he takes the stand that music is not an independent art; that all that is valuable in music is its power of expression. In it we have the most valuable voice for emotional power, but it must be wedded to poetry to get articulating power. Wagner accepts all these results of his theory, and is willing to sacrifice musical beauty to it. Says he: 'Music must give up its beauty and return to its primitive state of purely emotional expression.' What Wagner writes to be sung and played needs a new name. We can not call it music. It is not constructed in obedience to the fundamental laws of the art. We must not criticize his works or his arguments. We can attack only his premises. If we admit them, we can follow him to the bitter end. If, on the other hand, we hold that the essence of music is to appeal to the sense of the beautiful, we see his whole theory tumble to the ground."

Wagner is the author of the words as well as of the music of his operas, and, here again, there is a conflict among critics as to the literary value of his libretti. Some would make of him a dramatic poet, equal or superior to Shakspere, while others consider them as bombastic and silly. There seems to be but little doubt, however, that as literary compositions they are much superior to the ordinary opera libretto. As a critic, Wagner is merciless for the dead as well as for the living. For the purpose of venting his spleen at least as much as for that of praising himself, he has established a monthly magazine, the Baireuther Blätter, with one of his disciples, Hans von Wolzogen, as the editor, in which he has proven, to his own satisfaction, that there have been but two composers really worthy of the name, Beethoven and himself, Beethoven being a sort of "voice calling in the wilderness," and opening the way for the coming Messiah of music, whom Herr Wagner modestly claims to be. Even Beethoven tripped miserably, and, therefore, Herr Wagner, some years ago, "corrected" and "revised" Beethoven's great symphony with choruses, commonly known as the "No. 9," thereby raising a general cry of indignation among German musicians.

So far, it is certain that, though Wagner has succeeded admirably in raising a party, and a very violent one at that, he has utterly failed to become, what he would fain believe he is, the founder of a school, much less of the school of dramatic music. It is true that here and there an imitator has sprung up and seized upon the dissonances which are so dear to Wagnerian ears, and used them as if they were all there is of the Wagnerian drama, oddly and incongruously mingling the dramatic declamation of Wagner with the lyrical style of the Italian school into a sort of musical olla podrida, nauseous alike to Wagnerians and anti-Wagnerians. Nor is that to be wondered at. Wagner is the author of his own libretti, and in subordinating the music to the words and to the dramatic situations, he is not sacrificing himself to another, he is not the assistant of another (the poet), he is only setting forth his own literary work in the best possible manner. Is it not expecting too much of those who are only musicians, to think that they will constantly hide their personality and their art behind the work of another? And where are the musicians who, like Wagner, are dramatists as well as composers? But Wagner, who is nothing if not a consistent theorist, and who has no motives of personal pride to induce him, consciously or unconsciously, to let the musician assert himself above the poet, fails, even in his latest operas, to conceal the musician behind the librettist. Wagner, the poet, is himself lost sight of by those (friends and foes alike) who listen to his operas; and it is Wagner, the musician, it is the music, which he says is secondary, and not the libretto, which he says is all-important, that his friends and foes discuss. Is this not, perhaps, an indication that, improper as may be, and doubtless is, the prominence given in many operatic works, to the music, simply as music, and at the expense of the dramatic action, it is eminently natural that when music and the drama are wedded together, music should be given the more prominent place? In a word, may it not be doubted whether Wagner, in his endeavour to be true to the nature and relations of things, has not failed to be true to the instincts of man?

In the United States, Wagner is known almost exclusively by his earlier works, which, as we have said, are in no respect fair expositions of his theories, and, perhaps, for that reason, have obtained some degree of popularity. In his knowledge of the resources of the orchestra he is a master, and, save Berlioz, has probably had no superior in this respect.

[In the art of orchestral instrumentation, both Wagner and Berlioz, compared with Mozart and Mendelssohn, are mere babies—impetuous, turbulent, and noisy, it is true, but still babies.—Otto Beard.]

MR D'OYLY CARTE has engaged Miss Helen Dingeon for his next season at the New York Standard Theatre.

CONCERTS.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—At the sixth and last concert at St James's Hall, under the direction of Mr Charles Hallé, the want of public patronage witnessed on previous occasions was conspicuous. The reason will be found in the plethora of musical entertainments during the last few weeks. When a programme, comprising the "C minor Symphony" and the "Mass in D" of Beethoven, with a splendid orchestra for its execution, meets with indifference, the fact would seem to be brought home to us that classical music has, after all, but few enthusiastic followers. Indeed, the easy hold Mr Hallé had of his forces made us now and then fear lest the rate of speed should outrun the judgment generally distinguishing this accomplished musician. For it must be confessed the first movement did occasionally betray a dangerous impetuosity. The andante, likewise, was slightly quicker than we are accustomed to hear it taken. But the basses in the trio of the third movement, responding to the animation of the conductor, played the rapid passages, written apparently in joke* by Beethoven, with marvellous accuracy and power. Seldom has the wonderful passage preceding the grand burst of the finale been rendered with such poetic meaning, while the joyous theme leapt forth with triumphant force, and the ecstasy of the finale never once abated. The audience, though more judicial than excitable, expressed their approbation by applauding Mr Hallé as he deserved. When the orchestra and chorus applied themselves to the mighty "Mass in D," the sense of security which had prevailed, and is always necessary for perfect enjoyment, fled, and in its place came anxiety and fear. The remembrance of defeats sustained by other choirs naturally prepared the mind for failure. Although the performance on Thursday night was creditable and praiseworthy, yet it left another instance on record of the impracticability of thoroughly carrying out the designs of the exacting author, and strengthened the belief that singers cannot be found able to ascend the heights which the great master would have them climb. The Gloria, with its uncompromising terminal fugue, first tried the powers of the chorus, and the fugue to the words "Et vitam venturi sæculi" in the Credo, making, as it does, such extraordinary demands upon their resources, found them wanting. The repetition of the theme, on the highest notes of the soprano register, gave the sympathetic listener discomfort corresponding to the distress of the singers. In other numbers—the Kyrie Eleison, Agnus Dei, and Benedictus—the difficulties were fairly surmounted, the last-named being remarkably well sung, both by principals and chorus, while the violin obbligato, played by Ludwig Straus, was faultless. A better quartet of principals could scarcely be found. Mdme Albani's voice, towering above band and chorus, never failed her; Miss Orridge, perfect in the music, did excellent service; Mr Shakespeare again proved his value by consummate knowledge and clever singing; and Mr King was efficient in every respect. At the conclusion of the Mass Mr Hallé received a richly merited "ovation."—P. G.

MR JOHN THOMAS gave his annual concert, in St James's Hall, on Saturday afternoon, July 1st, when a large and fashionable company assembled to enjoy music, both old and new, performed by artists of established reputation. For Mr Thomas, deeming it a duty he owes to patrons, seldom lets such an opportunity pass without placing before them original compositions for the instrument of which he is an acknowledged master. On the occasion under notice, no less than seven pieces in the programme were marked "first time." The harp solo, "Echoes of a waterfall," is characteristic as well as fanciful; it not only, in a certain way, reproduces the sounds heard by those with senses alive to the music of nature, but it does so by the means of an art that is no slavish imitator. The harmonious tumult one hears when approaching the fall of a volume of water, the deep undertone that fixes the key-note, with its many branching harmonies, for these delightful combinations, the composer has cleverly and successfully found art-equivalents in his new solo for the harp. Melody, however, is not lost in the torrent of arpeggios that alternate with gentler passages, for Mr Thomas strives to keep tune ever present to the ear. The audience were fully alive to the beauty of the tone-picture, and insisted upon an encore. The second solo, "Rêverie," as its name implies, is widely different in character, being altogether subjective, the expression of thoughts springing from a dreamy nature. Opening with a melody of a pensive kind, it eventually indulges in wild and rugged passages, which the harp, favourable to enharmonic changes, so readily suggests. The return to the quietude of the opening theme is accomplished in a very musicianlike manner, and, moreover, shows the composer in his most poetic mood. As in the former solo, the audience testified their pleasure by warm applause. Of another order is the duet for harp and piano on airs from Carmen. Here the musician has availed himself of Bizet's piquant melodies and arranged them in an effective manner. In the introduction of this piece to the public, the composer had the able assistance of Lady Benedict, who played the pianoforte parts with rare expression and praiseworthy precision. The trio for two harps and pianoforte, founded on the "Miserere" scene from Il Trovatore, having, in performance, besides Mr Thomas, the assistance of Mr Wright and Mr Ganz, was heartily appreciated. A new song, "Dew-drop and Fairy," the vocal composition offered on this occasion by Mr Thomas to his patrons, was to have had Mdme Rose Hersee for interpreter, but as that lady was unable to appear on account of indisposition, Mdme Edith Wynne kindly consented, at a short notice, to sing it, and right well she acquitted herself of a task not always considered agreeable. The composer was certainly fortunate in having so willing and so able an artist to undertake the duty of presenting to the public a composition upon which he had evidently set some value. The audience were pleased both with song and singer. In addition to the above-named novelties, the band of harps played three newly arranged pieces, "Marche Solenelle" (Gounod), "Ave, Maria" (Schubert), and "Gigue" (Handel). The nine performers, under the conduct of Mr Thomas, were unanimous and accurate in attack, and produced a capital effect. Mr John Thomas had, besides Mdme Edith Wynne, the assistance of the following eminent vocalists: Miss Santley, Mdme Enriquez, Misses Hope Glenn and Beata Francis, Messrs Santley, Shakespeare, Percy Blandford, and Lewis Thomas. At the pianoforte were Sir Julius Benedict, Signor Pinsuti, and Mr Ganz.—P. G.

MR HENRY LESLIE'S CHOIR.—The first concert of the Leslie choir, since its reorganization, was given in St James's Hall on Tuesday evening, when a large and fashionable company assembled to greet, with hearty welcome, the resuscitated institution. Considerable regret was expressed when its founder, two years ago, determined to abandon the body of vocalists he had trained to such excellence; and, as the reasons for dissolution then stated seemed hardly sufficient to the public mind, a notion got abroad that caprice had more to do with it than necessity or expediency. At any rate, the difficulties that stopped the way have been easily surmounted, through the consent of Mr Randegger to act as conductor. In point of energy, for the work of revival no better man could have been selected than Mr Randegger, whose vigour, moreover, is quite capable of sustaining the society for some time to come. Few professors can boast greater experience of vocal music, since the training of singers has been with him a speciality. That the Leslie choir is worthy of his attention cannot be doubted, for it has qualities by which honourable results are easily secured. Confidence springing from fairly earned prestige enables the members to do justice to voices certainly in no way deficient in power and quality. This was evident at the concert on Tuesday, for, in the first part-song, "Lullaby of life" (Leslie), the full, vigorous tones of the choir could scarcely be restrained, while, in the following piece, "Come, live with me" (Sir W. S. Bennett), redundant energy and forcible accents were in excess of the demands made by the composition. But perhaps it was well for the choir to make, once for all, an assertion of its power, in order to remove the notion if any existed, that the society had become enfeebled. The audience, evidently impressed by this exhibition of unstinted vocal resources, saluted the choir with loud applause. An opportunity soon came in Macfarren's "The Sands of Dee," for the singers to show capacity in tender expression. This characteristic part-song was rendered with really finished art. The descriptive lines were clearly and graphically recited, whilst the subdued harmonies, set to the third verse of this little poem, were given with touching effect. That the audience recognized the effort as fine tone painting was evident by the encore so strenuously demanded. One feature in the choir is the enjoyment the singers appear to have in their occupation, and in no instance was this more evident than in Arthur Sullivan's very beautiful part-song, "O hush thee, my babie." In some executive bodies indifference or constraint is seen, but the members of Leslie's choir go with heart and soul at their work. Although the motet for double choir, "In exitu Israel" (Samuel Wesley), has for some years been a favourite show-piece with the choir, yet we cannot say that the performance on Tuesday altogether added to old renown, the inner parts, when left to sustain fugal passages, being occasionally undecided, and seeming to need the support of the basses, who, by the way, were always reliable. When Mr Henry Leslie appeared on the platform to conduct a part-song composed expressly for the choir and the occasion, he received an "ovation" from audience as well as choir. The words, set to music by Mr Leslie, are by Adelaide Procter, whose ideas the composer has fairly illustrated. There is the same striving for unity of purpose apparent in the musician as in the poet, but perhaps not the same measure of success. Notwithstanding sound workmanship everywhere present, Mr Leslie has hardly been happy in this setting. He has relied too much upon the effect of unisons abruptly followed by harmonies, and as the unisons are numerous, the device of going from plain to harmonized song becomes, in the end, stale and wearisome. The choir sang the work of their old chief magnificently. In Barnby's "Sweet and low" they also gained laurels by a full, yet subdued tone, by perfect intonation and clear phrasing; nor were they less happy in their rendering of "The Silent Land" (Alfred Gaul). Only one Elizabethan madrigal, "My bonny lass" (Thomas Morley), was included in the programme, and that was taken at a quicker speed than usual; whilst the only glee, "The cloud-clapt towers" (Stevens), grandly rendered, would have even gained in effect had it been sung through twice, according to ancient custom. The solo vocalists, Miss Orridge and Mr Maas, afforded a pleasant relief to the choral music. Miss Orridge, besides an impressive delivery of "The Unfinished Song" (Cowen), gave a fine rendering of recitatives and airs from Alexis (Dr. Pepusch), the violoncello obbligato being admirably played by M. Adolphe Brousil; while Mr Maas delighted all hearers in songs by Bishop and Leslie. The two singers were equally successful in the charming duet, "Mille volte" (Randegger). As the advertised repertory of the society comprises works by the older English writers of glee and madrigal, we hope to find liberal selections from them in future programmes.—P. G.

A CONCERT was given by Signor G. Villa on Wednesday evening at the new Town Hall, Kensington, which, if not largely, in the numerical sense of the word, was nevertheless fashionably patronised. Signor Villa is a bass vocalist of vigorous ability and gives much popular effect to what he sings in the concert room. Upon the present occasion, besides other things, he sang what was designated a "Marinaresca," by Signor Tito Mattei, the quaint and bizarre lineaments of which, dramatically reflected as they were by the bright and crisp finger of the composer himself, who accompanied him, pleased everybody. The programme was of liberal dimensions, and included in the vocal department, the names of Mdme Liebhart who sang in her own piquant and adroit manner G. B. Allen's pretty song, "Little bird so sweetly singing," though without the advantage of Mr Radcliff's obbligato flute which was promised. Mdme Vogri, Mdme Ducas, Miss Eugene Kemble, Miss Linda Rivers, Signor Rocca, Signor Palmieri, and others; to which the finished harp playing of Herr Oberthür, the brilliant pianoforte episodes of Signor Tito Mattei, the showy violinisms of Mdlle Victoria de Bono, and the gentle nullities of Herr Schulz on the zither, afforded varied relief. The conductors were Signor Li Calsi, Mr Edward Morton, Herr Vogri, and Mr Churchill Sibley.—H.

MDME LIEBHART'S MORNING CONCERT.—One of the most brilliant matinées of the season took place on Friday, June 30th, at 53, Portland Place, where, by permission of Mrs White, Mdme Liebhart arranged a charming musical entertainment by securing the valuable services of the stars of the season and giving her own. Mdme Pauline Lucca and M. Vladimir de Pachmann were strong attractions, while associated with these artists were Mdme Liebhart herself, Mdme Enriquez, Mdlle Olga de Morini, Mr Maas, and Mr Barrington Foote, vocalists; Herr Ondricek, violinist; Herr Oberthür, harpist; and Sir Julius Benedict, Signor Romili, Mr Kuhe, and Herr Ryal, conductors. Mdme Lucca's singing of Benedict's "Ange Adoré" was perfection, though it was regretted that the prima donna did not select for this occasion one of her popular operatic scenas. However, a re-demand was kindly complied with by Mdme Lucca, and she rendered the well-known "O Santissima Vergine" with infinite grace. The duet, "Schelm halt fest" (Der Freischütz), given by Mdme Lucca and Mdme Liebhart, was, it need not be said, a feature of the afternoon. Mdme Liebhart's solos were Lotti's ever welcome "Pur dicesti" and Lady Arthur Hill's "Time was," both sung with taste and expression. Mdme Enriquez's beautiful voice was allowed to lose no point in Gounod's "Quando a te lieta," and Mr Maas' Italian romances were well received, but would have been more artistically acceptable had he better modulated his voice to the size of the drawing-rooms in which he sang. Mr Barrington Foote introduced a highly effective song, "Time and Tide," by Mr Kuhe, who accompanied; and a very young lady, pupil of Mdme Liebhart, sang a little song with a pretty voice and manner. M. de Pachmann's pianoforte playing created interest and admiration. His examples were by Bach, Tausig, Haydn, Liszt, and Chopin. Herr Oberthür's harp fantasia was heard with favour, and Herr Ondricek was warmly applauded for violin solos. The bénéficiaire may be congratulated on one of the most successful musical parties of the season.—Weekly Times.

LONDON MUSICAL SOCIETY.—This society, of which the Duke of Albany is president, and whose performances represent the culture of the higher class of amateurs, gave a concert in St James's Hall on Thursday evening, under the direction of Mr Barnby. The proceedings began with Spontini's overture to Olympie, but the interest of the evening arose only in small measure from that example of a singularly neglected master. More to the taste of the audience was Ferdinand David's violin concerto in E minor; not, however, for the sake of Mendelssohn's friend and fellow-labourer, nor on account of a work which has comparatively few recommendations save to the solo performer. The attraction lay in the playing of Miss Emily Shinner, a young English lady, who has studied at Berlin under Joachim for same years past. It would hardly be difficult for a person not knowing Miss Shinner's antecedents to guess the name of her master, so faithfully does she reproduce some of the Hungarian artist's characteristics. But more important than this very natural consequence is the fact that she played on Thursday in a fashion which Herr Joachim would not be ashamed to put to his own credit. Miss Shinner has a tone of pure quality and sufficient power, a graceful style, and a "bow arm" singularly free. Her intonation is never at fault, while her execution of brilliant passages shows a command over the instrument surprising in one so young. More remarkable still, she plays cantabile, as in the slow movement of the concerto, with an expression impossible where there are not artistic qualities very fully developed. As Miss Shinner came forward quite unheralded, the nature of her début was a genuine surprise, which justly called forth the plaudits of the audience, and excited the orchestra to unwonted demonstrations. We hope soon to hear Miss Shinner in some recognized classic work, such as will enable her to more fully determine her position. The concerto was followed by Hofmann's interesting cantata, Cinderella, of which we had occasion to speak a little while since, apropos to its performance by the Tufnell Park Choral Society. On this occasion Cinderella was given with an orchestra for the first time in England, and gained immensely thereby, although it had not been sufficiently rehearsed. The solos were entrusted to Miss Amy Aylward (Cinderella), Miss Minna Vivian (Fairy Queen), and Mr J. Spooner Hardy (King). Miss Aylward sang well throughout, and gave an interesting reading of her part. Mr Hardy may be congratulated, judging from the work he did, upon having reached a high standard of amateur excellence. The chorus sang well, as usual; and Mr Barnby did not permit us to overlook the fact that he is a good conductor.

FLORAL HALL.—The opera concert, given in the Floral Hall on Saturday afternoon, was well attended, and the successes of the occasion were numerous. There is, however, very little to say in connection with it beyond words of mere record; as, for example, that Mdme Albani, singing her very best, and therefore exceedingly well, obtained an encore for "Casta Diva," and also for "The Song of May" by Gumbert, words by Mr W. S. Gilbert. Mdme Lucca was scarcely less fortunate than the popular Canadian, being twice recalled after "Voi che sapete," and encored in a ballad, "Sweet Angelus was ringing," the work of Signor Operti. We should add that both ladies appeared together in "Quis est homo," and gave infinite satisfaction. Mdme Tremelli's fine voice was heard to advantage in "Ah! quel giorno" and "Il Segreto," the last-named air having to be repeated, as had Meyerbeer's "Sorte amica," capitally sung by Signor Mierzwinsky and chorus. Among the other artists who took part in the concert were Mdlles Desvignes and Nordmann, MM. Soulacroix, De Reszké, Frapolli, and Gresse, besides a violinist, Herr Nachez, who played some pieces in brilliant style. The conductors were Sir J. Benedict, Signors Bevignani and Bisaccia.

GUILDHALL.—By permission of the Corporation a concert was given in the Guildhall on Saturday afternoon, the solo performers being students of the Royal Normal College and Academy of Music for the Blind. A very large number of persons attended, including the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs, and much interest was taken in the proceedings, as a natural result of the publicity given to the recent visit of the blind musicians to Windsor Castle. The Guildhall programme being substantially that performed before her Majesty, any remarks upon it or criticism of its interpretation would take us over ground already travelled. Enough that the decided talent of the students and the efficiency of their training were again demonstrated in the most positive manner. At the close of the musical selection Canon Fleming delivered the annual address, and the Lady Mayoress distributed a series of prizes for excellence in various branches of school work, gymnastics, pianoforte tuning, and so on. Four diplomas were subsequently presented by the Duke of Westminster to as many students whose course, we assume, has been completed, and the interesting ceremony closed with the singing of a "humorous glee" on the subject of Little Jack Horner. The musical conductors were Mr Manns and Mr W. H. Cummings, and the choir, numbering thirty-eight voices, was wholly composed of pupils.

THE pupils of Trinity House, Southwark, gave a concert on June the 28th, at Dunn's Institute, Newington Causeway, under the direction of Mr Brownlow Baker. The programme consisted of pianoforte solos, songs, duets, as well as part-songs by the singing class, who were heard in Mendelssohn's two part-songs, and several choruses by Smart, Gounod, Verdi, &c. Smart's duet, "When the wind blows in from the sea," well sung by Misses A. Sealy and A. Patrick, gained an encore, as did Schubert's "Alpine Hunter," sung by Miss Canning, and Mr Brownlow Baker's new march, "William the Conquerer," played by the composer.

MDLLE AVIGLIANA'S EVENING CONCERT.—One of those charming evenings when the atmosphere is agreeably sympathetic, was that of the 28th June, at Kensington Town Hall, when, immediately patronized by the Grand Duchess of Mecklenburgh-Strelitz and many peeresses, Mdlle Avigliana gave her evening concert. The fair bénéficiaire was heard to advantage in Costa's "I will extol Thee," which was encored, and in Braga's "Serenata," also re-demanded. Miss Damian's songs were received with particular favour; while duets by the Misses Layton, vocal variations by Miss Beata Francis, "The Night Watch," by Mr Barrington Foote, and solo pianoforte pieces by Signor Tito Mattei, were greatly applauded. In short, Mdlle Avigliana was fortunate in her artistic associations throughout a very full programme.

SIR J. BENEDICT'S CONCERT.

The forty-eighth annual concert of Sir Julius Benedict, given in St James's Hall on Wednesday afternoon, turned out to be the great success so easy to anticipate, and, having regard to its character and claims, so just and right. A host of friends and admirers came at the bidding of the distinguished musician; the programme was varied; the artists were excellent, and all passed off well. Seeing that no fewer than thirty-eight pieces were performed, there is reason, without looking further, for declining to notice the proceedings in exhaustive detail, and we must take the risk of being invidious as we select some of the more important features, giving precedence to those which were vocal. Mdme Albani was the "bright particular star," among the singers, and shone with becoming lustre in the elaborate air, "Souvenir de mioi prim'anni," from Le Pré aux Clercs. The lady has so made this trying piece her own that the manner of its performance need not be told. Let mention be made, however, of the help given to the general effect by M. Ovide Musin's playing of the violin obbligato. Mdme Albani was further heard in Gumbert's "A May Song," so pleasing the audience as to obtain a double re-call. Mdme Trebelli won scarcely less recognition by her singing of Engel's "Farewell," accompanied by the composer (harmonium) and Mr John Thomas (harp); while an encore was peremptorily demanded for Offenbach's piquant "Cest l'Espagne." The favourite contralto did not, however, repeat the song, choosing to substitute the appropriate and always welcome "Habanera" from Carmen. Among the other lady vocalists were Miss Rosina Isidor, successful in "Tacea la notte"; Miss Ellen de Fonblanque, whose artistic rendering of "Good Night" and "I think of all thou art to me"—two clever new songs by Mr Cowen—elicited marked admiration; and the Misses Robertson, to whom Gumbert, as composer of a duet entitled "Cheerfulness," owes much for the recommendation of his work by a perfect ensemble. Mdlle Grabow, a débutante from Stockholm, also appeared, making her mark in a song, "Le Colibri," the work of Ivar Hallstrœm, presumably a Scandinavian composer. We may add that Mr Hallstrœm's romance "Isola Bella," was chosen by Herr Oedmann, another visitor from the Swedish capital, and that he, as well as the lady, obtained approval. Among the male vocalists, however, the Englishmen gained and kept the foremost place. Signor de Reszké, Signor Frapolli, and others sang their operatic pieces remarkably well, but the firmest grip of the audience was taken by Mr. Maas in the scena, "My own Undine," from Benedict's cantata; by Mr King, in the concert-giver's fine air, "Rage, thou angry storm;" and by Mr Santley, in Gounod's "Medjé," and the Curate's ditty from Sullivan's Sorcerer. It is not too much to say—while it is pleasant to say it—that these countrymen of ours fairly outsang their foreign rivals and took first honours. Apropos, let the fact be noted, that of the solo artists who appeared during the afternoon eleven were English. We are getting on.

The instrumental pieces were varied, and, as a sign of the times, two lady violinists had a share in their performance. Of these, one, Miss Arma Harkness, is an American, trained at the Paris Conservatoire, to which famous school she does credit by uncommon skill. Miss Harkness was heard, conjointly with Mr John Thomas and the composer, in Sir J. Benedict's delightful Romance for violin, harp, and pianoforte. The second of the twain, Mdlle Marianne Eissler, represented a different school, but a great one all the same, while her playing of a Romance by Sivori and Paganini's Moto perpetuo had distinctive merit. M. Musin alone of the sex which once monopolized the violin asserted masculine talent, executing his own Caprice de Concert to perfection. On the other hand, M. Hollman had the violoncello to himself, and, we need hardly say, used it to excellent purpose. His rendering of a Nocturne and Mazurka, accompanied by Mr Ganz, was satisfactory in every respect. Mr L. Engel's harmonium solo, "The Piper and his Daughter," cleverly exemplified the powers of the instrument and the skill of its professor; and much interest attended the performance by Lady Benedict, Master Galeotti, Signor Ducci, and the composer, of Sir J. Benedict's Fantasia on American national airs, arranged for eight hands on two pianofortes. The Master Galeotti just referred to will be at once recognized as the "wonder-child" of the present season. His years are said to be only nine, yet on Wednesday afternoon he improvised with a fluency and skill that entitle him to be called with Chatterton, "a marvellous boy." Let us hope that he is another Mozart, in which case the unhealthy excitement of his young brain, though it may work mischief, will not prevent him from being as remarkable in manhood as in youth. There remains to add that the musical proceedings were pleasantly interrupted by Mr Henry Irving, who recited in his best manner the poem wherein Mr Edwin Arnold tells the story of Belshazzar's Feast, through the medium of verse at once graceful and impressive. MM. Bevignani, Bisaccia, Visetti, Ganz, and Randegger shared the work of accompanying the vocal pieces.—P. G.

"Mdlle Rosine Bloch"—says M. Joncières-Reyer-St Saëns—"si aimée du public Parisien vient de remporter un immense succès au Grand-Théâtre de Genève, où une véritable ovation lui a été faite dans la série de représentations qu'elle a données. Elle a chanté la Fides de Meyerbeer!"

"Messrs Boosey & Co. have done good service not only to amateurs but to art, by including in their series of volumes of national melodies 'The Songs of Scandinavia' and 'The Songs of Eastern Europe.' The first-named contains eighty-three examples; and the second, a hundred. We need not insist upon the importance of collections like these, whatever the country they represent; but we must say that no musical library is complete without the songs of Scandinavia and Eastern Europe. The editor, Mr J. A. Kappey, has taken great pains to secure melodies of a genuinely representative character, and at a time when attention is becoming more and more directed to folk-tunes as a source of new thematic ideas, the volumes in question are of peculiar value. They have our most hearty commendation, the 'Songs of Eastern Europe' more especially, since the volume contains, besides examples of Liszt, Chopin, and other masters, a very valuable collection of volkslieder from the hitherto untouched wealth of the Austrian provinces."—Daily Telegraph.

"Messrs Boosey & Co. have published two additional volumes of their National Songs, which appear likely to be the most interesting of the series. We know little of the rich repertory of Scandinavian Songs, and Mr and Miss Kappey, the editors of these books, are to be thanked for introducing some of the best specimens to public notice. Five of the Russian songs are so old as to be traditional; and in the series are to be found a beautiful Cossack lullaby by one Bachmetieff, a gipsy song by Lvoff, and several songs by Warlamoff. These and the Polish songs (all of which are traditional) may be considered among the most interesting items of a small but acceptable collection. Two ancient Lithuanian songs, a couple of Finnish, and four ancient Norwegian melodies, will likewise be found in the book. The majority of the Swedish songs are by Lindblad, that prolific song writer, who died in 1864. Tradition says that the old melody of 'The Beggar Boy' was once sung in the days when she was a poor child by the distinguished artist now known as Mdme Christine Nilsson. Included in the Danish songs is the traditional 'Dannebrog,' the music of which is attributed to one 'Bay.' It would be interesting to inquire the foundation for this statement, as the origin of the Danish National Anthem was generally understood to be unknown. The tradition of the 'Dannebrog Banner,' which, in 1719, fell down from heaven to bring victory to the Danish arms, is duly recorded in a footnote. Most of the Dutch songs given date back to the sixteenth century; and there are besides three songs by W. F. G. Nicolai, and one Flemish song. Altogether eighty-three of the national songs of northern Europe are included in this valuable and interesting book. In future editions a larger preface or more footnotes, giving further particulars of the old songs whose history is known, would be welcome. Equally interesting are the songs of Eastern Europe, recently issued by Messrs Boosey, and likewise edited by Mr and Miss Kappey. Among the thirty-four Austrian songs, the large majority are volkslieder, and they include Tyrolean, Styrian, and Polish songs, two of them by Chopin. These are followed by twenty-three characteristic specimens of Hungarian songs, giving a very fair idea of the peculiarities of Hungarian music, and comprising modern songs by Liszt, and some traditional songs of Bosnia, Moravia, and Dalmatia. The first of the Bohemian songs is the 'War-song of the Hussites,' once, it is believed, the national song of the country. A few specimens of Servian, Swiss, Greek, and even Turkish melodies. The last are very peculiar; and the peculiar intervals common to this and other Eastern music are claimed by some to have been handed down direct from the music of the ancient Hebrews."—Figaro.

"Miss Albrecht is not only a pianist of remarkable power and ability but a composer of very elegant music for her 'instrument de prédilection.' This spirited 'Martial Fantasia,' in G major, boldly asserts its title, and is indeed a stirring effusion, that might be made effective, in score, for a military band. The piece is no child's play, but will require study. The staccato octave passages alone supply work for fire-eating players."—"Musical Standard," May, 1882.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

Mr Grove (D.C.L.) at Leeds.

Mr Grove, introduced by the Mayor, said that his aim in attending the meeting was to make them better acquainted with the objects and scope of the institution the Prince of Wales had endeavoured to found, and which was to be called the Royal College of Music. It had been long felt that it was desirable we should have in England some central recognized authoritative musical institution, which should occupy with regard to music the same position as the Royal Academy did with reference to painting. Whilst there were excellent schools of music in London and other parts of the country, there was no institution which held a recognized authoritative position such as that held by the Conservatoires on the Continent, and in consequence of the need of which a large number of English students were driven, and had now been driven for many years, at the most impressionable part of their lives, to the Continent for the purpose of study, and who by that means naturally became not English, but German musicians. At one time of its history England had no doubt a very great and important school of music. The fact was now placed beyond the reach of doubt; and being mentioned by the Duke of Albany in his speech at Manchester, it was one which had extraordinary interest in this connection. There was a manuscript in the British Museum, written in the Abbey of Reading by John of Fornsete, in or near 1226, and which was allowed, not only by English antiquarians, but by the severest and most competent of Continental critics, to be a MS. of that date. The manuscript contained a round—a term well understood by musicians—which was one of the most melodious and beautiful little things that ever existed, called "Sumer, is icumen in?" It was written 150 years before any other piece of music which could be found on the Continent, and showed that at that time we were 150 years in advance of those great, learned Flemings and Italians whom we had always been in the habit of considering the inventors of music. More than this, the music in question was not written in the learned, crabbed style which marked the first productions of the Flemish and Italian contemporary schools, and which it took such a large number of years to at last enable them to produce the melodious and familiar music with which we were acquainted. English people, who had always believed themselves to be behindhand in music, turned out to be the greatest nation in the world in this matter. The character was maintained by the English school down to the seventeenth century, its works being much superior to anything found amongst the contemporary music of the Continent. The troubles of the Civil War ruined English music, no music being tolerated at that time except psalmody. When the House of Hanover came to the throne society began to be more settled, there was a demand for music, and the question of the revival or reorganization of the English school was raised. At that very moment, fortunately, in many respects, and, unfortunately, in others, the great musician, Handel, was in London, and it was found much easier to give large sums of money that Italian and German musicians might be brought to London to sing and to write oratorios, than for such an undertaking to be grappled with and carried out. From that day to the present English musicians had been under the heel of the foreigner. We had been so overwhelmed with Italian opera that people had got to such a pitch that when they did go to the Opera they did not care for the story at all, but only for the music. He granted that lately there had been an improvement, but it would take a long time to work a thorough alteration. The only way to do it was to have an independent school of music of our own, and keep our own people away from other schools. It was quite true that English music, if we had not much of it, had a character of its own. The musicians present would know the beautiful cantata, The May Queen; and, in his opinion, it was their duty to keep our English boys at home, to educate them here, and to make our English music as national, as characteristic as our literature, and our painting, and our manufactures, and other things of which we were so proud as Englishmen. The movement for the formation of a National College of Music actually dated from about 1870, when it was first taken up by the Duke of Edinburgh, who had himself for a long time been an enthusiastic amateur. He endeavoured to get the Royal Academy of Music brought from the somewhat confined position occupied in a back street near Hanover Square on to the estate of the Commissioners of South Kensington, and there was little doubt that if that could have been carried out, certain collateral advantages would have followed, as the Academy would have been brought into a position more consonant with the very great prestige which it enjoyed. That offer was declined, but the Duke was not daunted, for with the assistance of a large number of friends he founded the National Training School of Music, which was, no doubt, familiar to many of the Leeds people, although he

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

Professor Macfarren at Manchester.

Professor Macfarren, who was warmly greeted, said he accepted the kind welcome which they gave him on his first visit to their very musical city, less as a personal compliment to himself than as a tribute to the important institution which he had the great honour to represent. The following day, the 5th July, would be the sixtieth anniversary of the foundation of the Royal Academy of Music. On that day 1822, a meeting of noblemen and gentlemen took place in London, the late Earl of Westmorland, then not having ascended to the peerage, presiding. Lord Burghersh, as he was then styled, was a distinguished amateur and composer, and he entertained the notion that it was possible to develop musical talent in this country if there might be established means for its proper culture. With that view, he strove with great activity to found and permanently establish a school wherein the musical profession might be trained to the practise of composition, of vocalization, of instrumental performance, and of the also very high function of teaching. It was intended in the first instance that the instruction of Academy pupils should be gratuitous, and subscriptions were opened with the view of accepting pupils entirely free. The subscriptions, however, did not amount to sufficient for that purpose, and whereas it had been intended that a very large number of English students should be admitted to the benefits of the instruction of the Academy, it was found that in the first instance twenty only could be received, and even those had to pay a fee of ten guineas per annum—a sum which immediately afterwards had to be increased, as the funds at the disposal of the directors were inadequate to meet the cost of instruction. The musical profession of that time of day felt some jealousy at what appeared to be this interference with their rights and duties, and it was with some sacrifice of self-esteem that they were induced to enter into the work. Once entered, however, they worked with a zeal and a result which stood forth upon the history of music in this country. Their zeal was evinced at a very early stage of the proceedings, when, the collected funds proving inadequate to meet requirements, the professors for three months worked entirely without remuneration. By degrees it was found necessary to modify the plans of the Academy. The idea of gratuitous instruction was abandoned, and fees were ordained for the pupils to pay; but these were insufficient to cover expenses, and Lord Burghersh besought aid from Government. The Prime Minister of the day was unable to accede to his request, but there was granted a charter, signed by George IV. on the third day before his death. Under that charter the Academy had worked through various vicissitudes of fortune, but always, until a period which he should presently name, with a struggle against the difficulties of finance. Eventually the Committee of Management, finding themselves in debt, tendered to the Queen the resignation of the charter. Her Majesty refused to accept it, declaring through her secretary that nothing but an Act of Parliament could annul the document. At that moment another act of loyalty to their art was shown by the professors of the Academy, who undertook the services of the school with only such remuneration as the circumstances of the moment might afford. With these exertions, and the admission into the management of the professional element, the Academy changed its aspect altogether as regarded fiscal arrangements. The admission of the professional element had the effect of inspiring greater public confidence in the institution, as was shown by the fact that whereas at that time—1868—the average of pupils was from 60 to 70, there were at the present moment from 400 to 500 pupils (applause). It had been submitted that musical education could not be completed in this institution, and that young English students had to go to foreign conservatoires to complete the education for which England afforded no means or opportunity. Let it be fully known that in any time which he could recollect there had always been foreigners studying in the Royal Academy of Music, and it would be vain to suppose that they came to England because there was no possibility of obtaining education in their own country. That English students went abroad could not be doubted, but it must be borne in mind that English prejudice was very strongly in favour of foreign prestige, and that the young musician who came to England from abroad, with foreign honours shining round his head, was likely to have a more cordial reception than one who came from the next street in their own town. That was, he believed, to a great extent the reason why musical students went abroad, and it was certainly not because they had no means of culture here. He might be allowed to mention two instances. A young girl who was a pupil in the Academy displayed very great talent. Some wealthy friends of her parents urged that she should be sent to Germany for superior education, and, to meet her father's objections, offered to pay the expenses of her mother accompanying her, and of his having a housekeeper. The father resolved to leave his daughter at the Academy, and she was now one of the most distinguished pianists of did not see from the list that Leeds had any scholarships there. The education given in it was entirely free, being by ninety scholarships founded by private individuals and public bodies. The school occupied a house built and presented to it by a very munificent London builder, Sir Charles Freyke. The school was started in 1873, but it laboured under this fatal drawback, that the scholarships were promised for seven years only. The Duke of Edinburgh thought he had reason to believe that at the end of that time Government would take it up, and that it would become a permanent national institution. Government, however, did not do so, the scholarships lapsed, and the school was now at an end. The Prince of Wales had been so much pleased with the result, with the excellent teaching given entirely by English professors, and with the very clever students turned out of the school, that he and his brothers had said that they could not allow the movement to drop, but that it must be perpetuated on a broad and proper basis. They also said as there was the National Training College on the one hand and the Royal Academy on the other, could not their union be effected, so as to combine musical education both by payment and scholarships, assisted, as the movement would be, by great prestige and the support of eminent professors. The Prince of Wales thus called a meeting in 1878 at Marlborough House, and laid the scheme before it. Negotiations took place between the two for this purpose, but they eventually fell through, and although various efforts were made with the same object they did not meet with the desired results. The Prince of Wales had therefore no alternative but to call the meeting held on the 28th February in St James's Palace, London, when he submitted the scheme for the foundation of a Royal College of Music. The object of the scheme was to provide a central institution for education in music of a similar nature to the Conservatoires on the Continent, by the foundation of 100 scholarships, 50 with maintenance and 50 without. The 50 with maintenance might come from Leeds and other places, and even from the colonies, for there were many boys at present at Leipsic who had come from Australia. It was at first intended that the college should be entirely open to the whole of the kingdom and the empire, and that entrance should be by competition throughout. But it had been represented that the only way to enlist the support of the country to the movement would be by the provision of scholarships, which might be competed for in stated localities, and that the boys in those localities should not compete against others from distant districts. He wished that the scholarships had been all open, for there was more glory to a boy who competed against the whole of the country than against a district; still it was not essential, and the education in both cases would be exactly the same. There would be this difference, that whereas £2,500 would be sufficient to maintain an open scholarship, in the case of a local scholarship an additional £500 would be required. There would also be admissions by payment. One distinguishing mark of the institution would be, however, that entrance could only be obtained by competition. There would also be a determination to make the college a place of work, and not of recreation and amusement—strict examinations being kept up throughout. Students would have to go there with the intention of learning music in the best possible way, and treating it as a serious matter of life. He thought they would have a large number of paying pupils, and grounded his opinion on the large number of pupils at the Royal Academy, which, he believed, had an income of about £15,000 a year. The Guildhall School had also been established, where there were already 2,000 paying pupils, and the whole number of applicants could not be accommodated. He had no doubt the proposed college would also soon get the requisite number of pupils. The establishment of this college would not interfere with any existing institution, and there was not the least desire that it should be antagonistic in any sense to the Royal Academy. He only regretted that they would not be able, in connection with the proposed college, to take into its limits this distinguished school, which was the most important at present existing in this country, and that they should be obliged to stand by and see that institution acting separately from them. Still he did not think that either would interfere with the other. He believed there was such a period of development coming upon music in the next fifty years as had never been seen in England, and that it would be one of the most characteristic things of that period of our history. With regard to the college, no money would have to be spent on buildings for some time, and then it would only be when they were forced by want of accommodation, as they would have power to use theatres as practising-rooms given to them. He supposed the course of training at the college would last two or three years, and after the course was over many of the students, he expected, would come down to their native places with their certificates and form what he hoped would be the centre of musical circles there. Many young men, from their inability to find money and the leisure which the study of the day. She had several times visited Germany, where she had attained even greater success than in this country, and in Manchester she had been welcomed with the applause which her most excellent playing deserved. In another case, an Academy pupil was elected to the Mendelssohn scholarship—a fund applied to the education of musical students. The pupil was sent to Leipsic for further tuition, but when tasks were submitted to him there he informed the professors that he had already done them in the Academy. So conversant did he show himself with all that the Leipsic professors were ready to teach him that his removal was requested, and in consequence he was sent into another country. Much had been said with regard to the desirability of cultivating the study of orchestral instruments. Ever since the Academy had been instituted there had been orchestral practice twice a week for the pupils. As a pupil he used to play in the Academy band, and he ascribed most valuable consequences to the experience he gained in that position, though he never was able to undertake engagements as an orchestral player. There had always been Academy pupils engaged in the most important orchestras, several having engagements now with the Italian opera band; but the orchestral branch of music was the least remunerative, and was open to the most severe temptations of any portion of the musical profession. It was because it was so ill-paid, and because from circumstances which he could neither attempt to describe nor pretend to understand, many foreigners of talent were able to subsist on means on which persons accustomed to roast beef could do nothing but starve, that many of the best places in our orchestras were filled by foreigners. English persons who might develop orchestral talent were not allowed by their parents to enter that unremunerative branch of the profession. In the department of the lyrical drama the studies of the Academy were importantly directed. In view of the fact that of late years the tendency had rather been to sing in English than to sing in Italian, the operatic class of the Academy gave its attention to English versions of lyrical studies, and there would come before the subscribers next week a performance of one of the least known but most meritorious operas of Mozart by Academy students, with English text. The charter of the Academy was most flexible, enabling it to do any and every thing for the furtherance of the cultivation of music. For long years, with limited resources, the institution confined its operations to the education of the pupils confided to its care, but in recent years music had obtained a wider regard and more important consideration throughout the country, and the Academy had of late turned its attention to the study of music outside its own walls. In 1876 plans were drawn out and schemes arranged for holding throughout the country such examinations as had only been brought into effect in the last two years. There were reasons at the moment why the plans could not be applied. In the interim another institution had opened examinations of more or less the same nature. He thanked that institution. Whether the Academy plans had obtained circulation, and it had been bruited abroad that there were such intentions, and the other institution acted upon that; or whether, as had been the case with many important things, the good idea was conceived by two persons at the same time, was not the question. There was no copyright in a good action. The examining of the studies of a large number of well-intending persons was, he thought, a very good action, and he thanked that other institution for having been before the Academy in the field. It had given an impulse to the endeavours that were now in course of activity, but he rejected the statement that had been made to the effect that the Academy paid the compliment of imitation to the establishment which was already at work in the same field. With regard to local arrangement and the three local examiners in the Manchester district, Dr Horton Allison, who was an Academy pupil, undertook the function of giving advice to intending candidates for admission as pupils. Dr. J. M. Bentley, although he had had the good fortune and the great merit to have acquired his musicianship without the advantage of Academy training, had his will as much in the good cause as anybody who had been brought up in the school, and he it was who first proposed the putting into operation of this scheme of local examinations. Dr John Wrigley was a pupil in the Academy, to which he had been an honour as representing its good teaching, and of which he had been the friend in maintaining its interests. He would now turn to an embryo project of the Academy, viz., the purpose which was now verging upon maturity, and which was proposed some years since, of instituting in the chief centres throughout the land branch schools which might prepare pupils for the Academy. Those branch schools should have for their professoriate the musicians of the several localities, the schools to be conducted under the supervision of the Academy Committee, under the inspection of the Academy principal, and under the examination of such special teachers of the several branches of study as from time to time would visit them. When pupils were sufficiently advanced in these branch schools it might be perhaps music so eminently required, had been ruined by going to sing in public or by not being able to continue the requisite study. In order to avoid this it was proposed to found fellowships, to be won by examination at the conclusion of the course, so that clever students might obtain fellowships worth £100, which would enable them to pursue their studies. The college would thus possess the character of a University, and be the head English musical centre. All the most distinguished people connected with English music would be directed by degrees to its council and managing board. He hoped that the London and provincial musical societies would affiliate themselves to it, and examiners would be provided for them. They would be able to give advice in all matters of dispute, to confer degrees, and to become in time a sort of University of Music for England, in the same way as the London University was for literature, science, and cognate branches of study. So far only two appointments had been made in connection with the college. Mr Morley, son of Mr Samuel Morley, M.P. for Bristol, had been appointed hon. secretary, and the Prince of Wales had been good enough to name him (Mr Grove) director of the college. No German or other professors had been appointed, and it was time that they shook off the idea which had possessed them so long that we were nothing but copiers of German writers, for that was perfectly untrue. Dr Arne and Dr Arthur Sullivan had shown them what English composers could achieve. Let them nurse the beautiful fragrance until it permeated the Yorkshire wolds and the Lancashire hills, so that we might take as high rank in music as the country had in literature. Their desire was to assert the power, dignity, and ability of the English school, and to raise it to its proper position in the world. He was sure Leeds, which had got a choral body the like of which he had never heard in London, Germany, or elsewhere, and which possessed a Corporation so enlightened as to give them the splendid organ in the Town Hall (which it had been a great pleasure for him to hear), would take a favourable view of the formation of the proposed college. This matter should not be put forward upon a narrow musical basis; it was a question of education. Music had a certain influence in the world, it had so established itself as to become a necessity of life, and raised itself into the dignified position occupied by the art of painting. The result of art education in the country had been astonishing, and the strides which had been accomplished during the last thirty years in the tastes of the people marvellous. He asked them to try music in the same way, and he was perfectly certain in thirty or fifty years from this time the same difference would be observable, and that it would be a practical and social effect which, at present, they did not dream of. The great charm of the year in London was the Royal Academy Exhibition, and he was certain the annual celebration of the Royal College of Music would become to be as great an attraction. The college was certain to be founded, whether Leeds assisted or not, because the Prince of Wales had made himself personally responsible. How would it look if a great town like Leeds, or a great district like the West Riding, had no part in the matter? Besides, it would not be fair. Leeds would probably be the first to knock at the college doors, for they were certain to send up some of their clever Yorkshire boys, with their fine musical voices, for training in the college. What was £3,000, £5,000, or £10,000 for a great town like Leeds? It meant, in many cases, a mere scratch of the pen and a little diminution at the banker's, which would never be regretted, but which, on the other hand, would always be a source of thankfulness to the donor.

Mr T. Wemyss Reid proposed that "the thanks of this meeting be presented to Mr Grove for his courtesy in attending to explain the object of the college." He believed he was indebted for the honour of proposing this resolution to the fact that he had the privilege of knowing Mr Grove, and that he could say something of the work he had known him do in other capacities than that in which he appeared before them to-day. Mr Grove's address was so well conceived that it was admirably calculated to serve the purpose he had in view. They must not forget also that Mr Grove had been of great service to English music in many departments: but it was for the work in which he was engaged as the editor of that admirable Dictionary which would be the standard work of the future on the subject of music, and as the person who had had the greatest share in bringing to a successful issue both the Saturday afternoon concerts at the Crystal Palace and the great Handel festivals, which had done such credit to the English musicians of to-day, that he was perhaps most entitled to their gratitude. Mr Grove, thanking those who had promised donations, observed that twenty years hence they would be proud of the result of that day's meeting.

desirable for them to be transplanted to the metropolis, where, the best musicians always endeavouring to concentrate themselves, the highest instruction might be expected, and where alone could be witnessed musical performances essential in experience to the student.

The Bishop of Salford, in moving a vote of thanks to Professor Macfarren for his address, said he had no misgivings that the establishment of a Royal College of Music would interfere with the Royal Academy of Music. He hoped that the Dream of Sir Julius Benedict might be realized, and that through these two institutions might be founded in this country a University of Music. Professor Macfarren said the Royal Academy was self-supporting, and had expended £6,000 in the erection of a concert-room. But it had no means at present of extending operations outside its own doors. During the proceedings Mr J. Kendrick-Pyne played several pieces on the organ.

A PROTEST FROM HARRY WALL.

SIR,—With reference to the article published in The Era, dated the 24th inst., it is true that I am not the composer of the music or the author of the words, of the songs, &c., over the sole liberty of public performance of which I claim control, either as being myself the proprietor thereof or as agent for some one else who is. But I purchase, by money payments, such rights of public performance from the composers, authors, or their personal representatives, or assigns, who are anxious to accept my money in exchange for, and so dispose of, their rights to me, and, having so purchased, I endeavour to legally "protect" my "property." I do not (and never did) pretend to protect the interests of music, art, the public, professionals, or amateurs. I cannot, at present, afford to be so generous. I merely seek to protect and enhance my own interests—singularly selfish individual that I am. And I learn from the creators of the respective productions that they themselves would have been only too glad to have done the same, but they did not know that, or how, they could do so. The press, public, managers, professionals, and amateurs may rail as much as they please because I do not allow the free use and enjoyment to the public of that which I have myself bought and paid for; but, once for all, no expression of public opinion will influence me in the least as to how I choose to deal with my private rights and property. The Legislature of our country, in its wisdom, thought fit, solely for the benefit and advantage of authors and composers of such productions, or their personal representatives, assigns, or other proprietors, to expressly create and protect such rights, and to provide remedies in case of their invasion, and, so long as I buy under such statutes, I shall seek to be paid under them. If the Acts of Parliament require amendment, the sooner they are amended the better.

For the protection of any who otherwise may offend in ignorance against the Acts, I again suggest what I believe to be the plan most practicable. Let it be enacted that no proprietor of performing right shall maintain an action for infringement thereof unless he has first caused an entry to be made in a registry-book at Stationers' Hall or some proper place, wherein shall be expressed that he is the proprietor of such reserved right, together with such other particulars as are necessary for the guidance of the public. The price to be charged for such entry to be (say) 6d. or 1s., to include a receipted copy of such entry (and not, as at present, 5s. for the entry, and 5s. for a copy thereof). Then let a Gazette be published weekly at 1d, containing a list, alphabetically arranged, of all such entries therein made—the fact of such Gazette being so published to be publicly advertised, as widely as possible, in every newspaper in the kingdom for, say, a month. Or, it may be enacted (if practicable) that some such words as "sole right of public performance reserved" should be printed on the title-page of every published musical composition, song, &c., by the proprietor of the "copy"-right (which word merely means the sole and exclusive liberty of printing, or otherwise multiplying copies), and, if he be not also the proprietor of the right of performance thereof, and has not printed such notice thereon, that he shall be compelled to do so, on being so required by the proprietor of the latter right. Whether such enactment should be retrospective in its operation, either as to productions published before, or as regards copies already printed before the passing of the Act to be left to the Legislature. There would surely then be no reason why such "brainwork" should not be equally protected with hand or machinework, or other produce, and be as legally recognized as is other property. But I really fail to see why I should be expected to be continually advertising at my own expense for the benefit and information of the public the particulars as to the private property I may from time to time acquire. If it is to the interest of the public to know, let it adopt the proper means to ascertain.

It was attempted in 1876, but soon found to be quite impracticable, to constantly keep in print a complete catalogue, containing the names of all the numerous productions under the control hereof, owing to the numerous additions and other changes which are continuously (almost daily) being made to and in the list. To make a written list, as it at present stands, would take about a couple of months, and cost over £30, for there are more than 2,000 productions of a single living composer under the protection of the office. But since 1875, if any programme containing the names of the compositions proposed to be produced at any public entertainment (of which the place and date must be stated), has been submitted to this office, together with 2s. 6d. fee (stamps), all the information required in connection therewith which may be within the province or knowledge of the office has been, as a rule, immediately furnished, with the view to preventing any payments under the statutes being incurred for infringements. You state in your article, that "an amateur vocalist who sings a song for nothing, to benefit a charity, is treated by Mr Wall as a criminal." I certainly do not recognize as "charity" concerts many that are "so called," but view them rather as vanity concerts, and treat them accordingly.

On the other hand, there are certain annual public concerts which I well know to be truly such, at which (like the one referred to in the programme herewith enclosed) any productions (words or music) are freely performed, and the words printed by consent. I cannot understand how I can be said to treat as a "criminal" an individual to whom I make a demand for a payment legally incurred, and against whom civil proceedings are commenced, and if necessary continued, when such claim is resisted. But if such person were to take similar liberties (whether under the cloak or plea of charity or not) with the wares of a baker, coal merchant, or blanket seller, as are taken with my "property" (which is generally more dearly purchased), I fear that he would then undoubtedly be treated as such. I purchase for the sake of making profit, and (as the circulars of this office, published by thousands, show) consent to the public performance of any song under my control, which may be (and may have been ever since the office was established, in 1875), as a rule, obtained from me on pre-payment of a fee of five shillings (stamps) for each performance. As a rule, performing rights only, and not "copy"-rights (that is, printing rights), are purchased by, and belong to the office managed by me, and whether fifty or 50,000 copies of a song are sold by the publisher is immaterial to the proprietor, who owns merely the performing right. Before a person enters a court, either of law or justice, perhaps it would be well to hang up on a peg outside all sympathies, feelings, sentiments, and prejudices.

With regard to the action "Wall v. Taylor," and likewise "Myself v. Martin," as the same are still sub judice, I refrain at present from making any comment, merely remarking that a rule nisi has been granted in each case, on the grounds of mis-direction by the judge to the jury, and that the jury's verdict was against the weight of evidence.

MAYORS' NESTS.

The Mayors of the realm appear to take special interest in the establishment of the projected Royal College of Music. "Alderman Hill, for example, our Mayor"—says a correspondent from Bradford—"lately called a meeting in his own parlour at the Town Hall, to consider what steps should be taken to support the scheme, a committee being appointed. As a result, our Mayor has forwarded to the Prince of Wales a cheque for £1,000, the first instalment from Bradford. "The fact that at the same time preparations were being made for the opening of the Technical School, and other matters entailing considerable expense upon the town, was not without an adverse effect, as many were unable to subscribe so liberally as they otherwise might." Our Mayor, however, is not without hope of being able to make a liberal addition.

That all Mayors are musicians is as well known as that few musicians are Mayors. Nevertheless, at Leeds, hard by, we find a Mayor recalcitrant, and, therefore, less musical than is the case with ordinary Mayors. We read in the Leeds Mercury, with reference to a meeting summoned for the same object:—

"The Mayor, who had no hesitation in calling the meeting, was gratified to find that the formation of the Royal College of Music was being promoted by the wealthy and influential of the country. It seemed appropriate that the matter should be placed in the hands of persons of high rank rather than in the hands of members of the industrial communities, who had suffered and were suffering from depression in trade. The effect of the movement would be rather an extension of recreation and amusement, the facilities for which we in Leeds were not deficient in, than of arts useful to an industrial community. He quite agreed, however, with the foundation of such a college, for if music tended to the refinement and elevation of the people, it would have a greater tendency in that direction if it were taught in a superior than in an inferior manner."

This Mayor, facts staring him in the countenance notwithstanding, seems inclined to "look at home." We cannot but applaud this Mayor, who, although Sir Andrew Fairbairn, M.P., insinuated, at the Leeds meeting, that he was "veering round," shows no sign of veering at all. This Mayor, consequently, lays himself out fearlessly to public opinion—which is "fudge," in my private opinion. Let, therefore, this one Mayor receive his due. There are Mayors and Mayors—or, rather, Mayors and a Mayor.—Dr Blitge.

SHUT OUT FOR WANT OF A KEY.

PUBLISHER BUMPUS.—Well, Professor, what have you brought this time?

PROFESSOR.—A grand fantasia, Sir.

PUBLISHER BUMPUS.—Humph! we have five hundred such in our lower cellars, our oubliettes, all in manuscript. We shall never print one of them. What is your theme?

PROFESSOR.—A theme from Tristan, Sir.

PUBLISHER BUMPUS.—Whose Tristan?

PROFESSOR.—Isolde's, Sir.

PUBLISHER BUMPUS.—Who's Isolde? Hum it.

PROFESSOR.—I can't hum it, Sir. It is quite different from themes that can be hummed. It is Wagner's—a leit-motive.

PUBLISHER BUMPUS.—Well, that's better than a heavy one. What key?

PROFESSOR.—It begins in A minor, Sir.

PUBLISHER BUMPUS.—Why the lesser third? How long does it remain in A minor?

PROFESSOR.—It does not remain, Sir, it diverges.

PUBLISHER BUMPUS.—I don't much care about themes that diverge. Our house has a strong objection to themes that diverge. What is the prevailing key?

PROFESSOR.—There is no prevailing key, Sir. Wagner has an aversion to prevailing keys.

PUBLISHER BUMPUS.—Don't it ever go into A with the greater third?

PROFESSOR.—No, Sir; it passes by it occasionally, but——

PUBLISHER BUMPUS.—I suppose your fantasia has another theme or two?

PROFESSOR.—No, Sir, it is the only theme; it is spread over the whole opera.

PUBLISHER BUMPUS.—And is the fantasia all in A minor, with the lesser third?

PROFESSOR.—No, Sir, only the opening——

PUBLISHER BUMPUS.—Have you brought your MS.? Show—

PROFESSOR (showing manuscript).—

PUBLISHER BUMPUS (peruses attentively a page of the MS)—Why, this is no key at all. Does it go on to the end in the same way?

PROFESSOR.—Yes, Sir; Wagner does not admit of keys.

PUBLISHER BUMPUS.—Our house can't do without keys. Take it to Wall. It's of no use to us. [Exit Publisher.

PROFESSOR (solus).—There's no dealing with this Bumpus. Wall's a good idea though. I'll show it to Wall, and if he won't have it, I must go to the wall. [Exit dejected.

A TABLET has been affixed to the house known as No. 8, Galerie-Strasse, Dresden, to commemorate the fact that C. M. von Weber occupied the second floor from the 28th September, 1822, to the day of his death. (He died in London.—Dr Blidge.)

BERLIN.—Schröder-Hanfstängl's engagement at Kroll's is prolonged. Among the artists who have appeared with her is Naumann-Gungl, a widow, daughter of Joseph Gungl, the well-known composer of dance-music. She was much applauded as Valentine in the Huguenots.—The Central Skating Rink will in future be devoted to artistic purposes, to fit it for which the necessary alterations are being carried out. It will henceforth be called the Philharmonie. Some sixty members of Bilse's old orchestra are engaged, and from the 17th October will play four times a week—Wednesday being the "Symphony night." Anton Rubinstein's sacred drama, Das verlorene Paradies, conducted by the composer, is to be performed.

MESSRS ASHDOWN AND PARRY.

THE long continued partnership between the original institutors of this esteemed and prosperous firm has been dissolved by mutual agreement, and, it is superfluous to add, under conditions acceptable to both parties. Mr Henry Parry retires, after a connection with the music-publishing trade of more than forty years, during which he has earned respect in equal degrees for his ability, integrity, spirit of enterprise, and uniform courtesy to every member of the musical profession with whom he has come into contact. Mr Parry retires, it need hardly be said, upon considerations not less ample than honourably claimed. The business is henceforth to be carried on exclusively by his late associate, Mr Ashdown, under the new style of "Edwin Ashdown;" and that the firm hitherto recognized as "Ashdown & Parry," directed by one in all respects so thoroughly competent and experienced, will maintain to the full its high reputation may be taken for granted.

GEORGE ALEXANDER MACFARREN AT MANCHESTER.

(From the "Manchester Examiner and Times," July 5th.)

Professor Macfarren yesterday distributed the prizes to the Manchester students of the Royal Academy of Music. The circumstances were of more than ordinary interest, for it was the eminent composer's first visit to this city, and it was ominous that this should fall on the eve of the sixtieth anniversary of the foundation of the Academy with which Dr Macfarren's name is so honourably connected. There was, no doubt, some curiosity in the audience to see the gifted musician whose operas, cantatas, oratorios, &c., were familiar in, to use his own phrase, our "very musical city." It is probable, however, that beyond this there was a hope that something would be said by a man than whom none has a better right to speak on a subject which at present concerns the Academy of Music very closely indeed. Sixty years to-day the Academy has been working through divers vicissitudes of fortune to further the musical education of the country; and it was natural that men who knew of its history and its success should wish to hear something said with regard to the comparative merits of the old institution and the Conservatory now being created. Dr Macfarren, however, made no reference to the subject directly, and yet indirectly his address was, if a vindication can be said to have been wanted, a complete vindication of the Academy and its work. Musical people will not need to be reminded that it was within its walls that Arabella Goddard acquired her facile mastery of the piano,* or that it gave Arthur Sullivan the knowledge which enabled him, on his entrance at Leipsic, to produce music at once original and beautiful. Dr Macfarren mentioned in his historical retrospect that from 1868 to the present time—from the date when the professional element was admitted into the school—the average of pupils had increased from between 60 and 70 to between 400 and 500. Among these, as we all know, have been some of our foremost contemporary vocalists, and it must be remembered, too, that a large part of its useful work has been to cultivate hundreds of sweet voices which would otherwise have been lost among the valleys of Wales. It would be a pity if the high position the Academy has attained were to be overshadowed by a Conservatory to be established under august patronage, and by a national subscription. It is not inconsistent to wish success to the projected Royal College of Music, and yet to hope that the old institution may continue to do good and prosper.

[* This is a mistake on the part of our able contemporary. Arabella Goddard was never a student in the Academy of Music, though she did more than any other public performer to spread the fame of the concertos and pianoforte compositions in general of Sterndale Bennett, whose early and long connection with the institution of which he was for some years "Principal" is one of the most emphatic and enduring testimonies to its worth as the medium of promulgating what is highest and most estimable in art.—OTTO BERG.]

This series illustrates the progress of arms and armour, from the skins and shields of the Ancient Britons, through the mail of the Saxon and Norman periods, to the full development of plate armour in the fifteenth century, its disuse, and the general adoption of firearms. In the centre is a small panel with the characteristic device of the National Rifle Association surrounded by a wreath of olive and palm, symbols of peaceful victory. The upper arm of the cross is occupied by a bard chanting the praises of military achievements, above which, on a ribbon in raised letters, is the title of the prize, "The Brinsmead Challenge Shield." The remaining decorations are the monogram of the National Rifle Association, with rifles, oak wreaths, &c.

CONCERTS.

THE Musical Artists' Society, which, existing for the production of new works by English composers, has a strong claim upon sympathy and support, gave its twenty-sixth concert in the hall of the Royal Academy of Music on Saturday evening. Several novelties were presented, all, in some respect or other, justifying the decision that gave them a place in the programme. This may especially be said of a sonata in F sharp minor for piano and violin, the work of Miss E. M. Lawrence, who had Herr Weiner as her associate in its performance. The slow movement of the sonata is really a creditable effort, nor can any charge be brought against the finale on the ground of wanting clearness. Miss Lawrence will do well to persevere as a writer of chamber music. A sonata for piano and violoncello, by Mr E. Sharp, while giving evidence of industry and skill, lacked the inventive essential to such a work. That this was completely absent we do not say, inasmuch as there were points in both scherzo and andante worthy special notice. Mr Sharp was assisted by Mr Z. Libotton. Some clever variations for organ on a Handelian theme, capitally played by Mr Turpin, placed the talent of Dr W. Creser in an advantageous light; but the success of the evening fell to Mr Walter Macfarren, whose sonata in F, for piano and violin, entrusted to Miss M. Gyde and Mr Ralph, met with a very favourable and well-deserved reception. This work, one of the most sympathetic that bear the composer's name, was played admirably. The vocal pieces were allotted to Miss Madeline Ashton, Miss von Hennig, and a choir conducted by Dr Leeds-Bradford. Miss Ashton introduced three songs by the German composer Wolff, with English words by Mrs Ashton. Miss von Hennig brought forward a song, "Passed to Heaven," by Duncan Hume.—P. G.

MDLLE THÉRÈSE CASTELLAN, a distinguished lady violinist, gave a concert on Friday afternoon, July 7th, at Lancaster Gate (by permission of Mr and Mrs Owen Lewis), which was well attended. She herself took but a modest part in the proceedings, being satisfied to begin them with a sonata by Porpora, for violin and piano (Signor Samuelli), to close them with a Polonaise by Vieuxtemps, and, meanwhile, to play one or two obbligati. Mdlle Castellan erred in the direction of self-effacement. We mean no disparagement to the other artists in saying that she was on this occasion the chief attraction, and should have occupied a foremost place in the programme with some important solo. Happily, her talent needed no demonstration, being well-known and frankly recognized. Mdlle Castellan had able assistance. There was Mr George Grossmith, for example, to make the solemn and silent morning audience laugh as he discoursed on "What is music?"—and who told many a serious truth under the mask of fun. Then there were Misses de Fonblanque, Le Brun, and Elliot, each with pleasing songs, those sung by the first-named lady comprising two introduced by her at Sir Julius Benedict's concert, composed by Mr Cowen, in one of which, "I think of all thou art to me," he even measures swords with Signor Tosti, whose setting of the same verses has been made familiar by Mr Santley. Avoiding comparisons, it may be said that interest arises from noting the very different manner in which the two musicians have treated the same subject.* Miss de Fonblanque, as also the two ladies whose names we have associated with hers, contributed largely to the general success. The male vocalists were Isidore de Lara, Campobello, and Ghilberti; the solo pianist (also male) being Tito Mattei. Gelli, Samuelli, and Romili acted as accompanists.—P. G.

SCHUBERT SOCIETY.—The seventy-first and last concert of the sixteenth season took place, on Thursday evening, July 6th, at Langham Hall, for the benefit of the director, Herr Schuberth. The programme was miscellaneous, beginning with Beethoven's Grand trio in B flat, for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, played by Herren Hause, Otto Booth, and Schuberth. The other concerted piece was a quartet by Raff, played by the same gentlemen with the addition of Herr Witt (viola). Solos on the pianoforte, violin, and zither were given during the evening by Herren Hause, Otto Booth, and Von Goutta. Herr Schuberth introduced a composition (MS.) of his own for the violoncello, the melodious theme of which, and its musicianly treatment, so pleased the audience that he was compelled to repeat it. The singers were Mesdames Dukas, Vogri, and Frith; Misses Foresta, Fitzgerald, and Ronayne; MM. de Monaco, Isidore de Lara, Frith, Dyved, Lewis, and Mackey. The concert, altogether, gave perfect satisfaction to a numerous audience, and was one of the most successful of the season.

* Nevertheless, the composer of the Scandinavian Symphony must beware of overleaping discretion. To "measure swords with Signor Tosti" is no small adventure. Quentin Durward "measured swords" with Dunois; but the swords, being of equal length and sharpness, were speedily re-scabbarded. —Dr Blidge.

Mr Wallworth's matinée musicale held on Saturday, July 8th, at his residence Wimpole Street, was successful in attracting a large audience as well as in the performance of a varied programme by his many intelligent pupils, among whom we can single out for especial praise, Mr MacDonnell and Mr. T. W. Price, the former exhibiting a beautiful tenor voice, and the latter a legitimate barytone, both being heard to advantage in a selection from Mr Wallworth's opera, Kevin's Choice, favourably produced, it may be remembered, in March last at the Adelphi Theatre, when its merits were discussed in The Musical World and other journals. Among the lady pupils who distinguished themselves on the present occasion were Miss Edith Ray, who rendered Signor Schira's "Sognai" charmingly, Miss Pauline Featherby who sang Rossini's "Di tanti palpiti," Miss Edith Aloof who gave Sterndale Bennett's "To Chloe in sickness," Madame Pelletier, Misses Eleanor Crux, Evelyn May, Louise France Rossiter, Florence Major, Ellis Walton, and Kate Forster, and among the gentlemen were Messrs C. H. Victor, and C. Parker. Mr Wallworth himself only contributed one song, Mozart's "Per questa bella mano," in which the obbligato flute accompaniment was played in perfection by Mr Barrett (of the Royal Italian Opera). The programme was varied by Mr H. Parker playing on the pianoforte a Sarabande of his own composition, and Miss Alma Sanders a fantasia on American airs. The concert concluded with Rossini's "Dal tuo stellato" (Mosè in Egitto) sung with remarkable precision by Mr Wallworth and his pupils. The accompanists were Miss Alma Sanders and Mr Henry Parker.

Mr F. B. Jewson, the esteemed professor of the pianoforte at the Royal Academy of Music, gave a matinée musicale at his residence, Manchester Street, on Saturday, July 8th, when, among other attractions offered to his friends, were two movements from a trio (for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello) of his own composition played, con amore, by Miss Ellam, Mdme Dunbar Perkins (Mrs Frederick A. Jewson), and Mr W. C. Hann. Judging from these excerpts (andante and allegro), we are inclined to place Mr Jewson's trio in the same high category as his concerto, played with so much success by Miss Dinah Shapley at a recent concert given by the students of the Royal Academy of Music at St James's Hall. The trio was received with every demonstration of favour, and we trust soon to have the pleasure of hearing it in its complete form. Mdme Dunbar Perkins afterwards played a Rêverie by Vieuxtemps and a Mazurka by Wieniawski, in each exhibiting beauty of tone and perfection of mechanism. Miss Edridge in Liszt's "Spinnerlied," Miss Smyth in two studies by Sterndale Bennett, and Mr S. Wiggins in Chopin's "Berceuse," proved themselves apt pupils of an excellent master, who (from the legitimate style of their performances), we are under the impression, must be Mr Jewson. The programme was varied with some excellent singing by Mrs Harvey, Miss Carreras, and Mr Miles; solos on the violoncello by Mr W. C. Hann, and on the pianoforte by Miss Dinah Shapley; Mr Seymour Smith contributing an amusing musical sketch, entitled "A dinner party."

Mdlle Fioretti gave a matinée musicale at the large room of the Grosvenor Hotel, on Thursday, July 6, and proved herself a pianist of high attainments by her performance of a trio by Haydn, in conjunction with Mdlle de Bono (violin), and M. Albert (violoncello), as well as in Osborne and de Beriot's duo for pianoforte and violin (with Mdlle de Bono) on airs from La Favorita. Mdlle Fioretti was assisted by Mdme Liebhart, Mdlles Beata Francis and Olga di Morini, Signors Villa, Ria, and Zoboli, as well as by Mr Eistore, an amateur, who displayed an excellent voice and distinct articulation in Gounod's "Maid of Athens." Several admired pieces were "recited" with effect by Miss C. Duvernay, and Mr Lin Rayne. Solos on the pianoforte were also given by Signor Tito Mattei, on the violin by Mdlle de Bono, and on the violoncello by M. Albert, the concert terminating with the well-known quartet from Rigoletto. Signor Sala accompanied.

Miss Helen Hopekirk gave a pianoforte recital at the Marlborough Rooms on Tuesday, July 4. The following is the list of pieces the clever young artist selected for the occasion:—

1. Faschingsschwank aus Wien, Op. 26, (Schumann); Sonata, Op. 26 (Beethoven). 2. Lieder ohne Worte (Mendelssohn); Momens musicaux, in A flat and F minor (Schubert); Prelude and Marcia Fantastica (Bargiel); Nocturne, in E, Etude, in G flat, Two Mazurkas, Valse, in A flat (Posthumous), and Ballade, in A flat, (Chopin); Romance, in E flat, and Valse Caprice, in E flat (Rubinstein). 3. Romance, "O du mein holder Abendstern," and Processional March (Tannhäuser) (Liszt).

The Misses Huntington's Matinée Musicale.—An agreeable "hour of music," arranged by the Misses Huntington, took place, by permission, at 37, Wimpole Street, on Monday afternoon, July 10th, when a large and distinguished assembly gathered to hear the singing and pianoforte playing of the charming sisters. Miss Effie Huntington, besides sympathetic accompanying, gave examples of her technical skill by performing Schumann's "Kreisleriana" and "Soirée de Vienne" (Schubert-Liszt); while the vocalist, Miss Agnes Huntington, sang the popular aria from La Cenerentola with power and flexibility, and was further heard in another style by rendering German songs, of which Schubert's lovely "Ungeduld" was last in the selection. Lady Simeon, Mr Faber, and Mr and Mrs Atherton Furlong, usefully varied the programme; while Miss Kellogg, in place of the Hon. Alex. Yorke (an absentee), "recited" with her accustomed dramatic effect.—B.

PROVINCIAL.

Cheltenham.—A pianoforte "Recital" by the pupils of Mr Ricardo Linter was given in the Rotunda on Tuesday afternoon, July 11th. The room was filled with friends of the pupils, and the programme a long and varied one, carried out with but few omissions, was listened to with the greatest interest. The "Recital" opened with a duet on two pianofortes—Benedict's Der Freischütz, brilliantly played by Miss J. Hunt and Mr Linter, and concluded with Raff's duet for two pianofortes, Chaconne, performed by Mr Linter and his daughter, Mrs W. H. Coles, and many of the pupils were from the school of the Misses Robinson, Alston Court. Want of space compels us to omit details, but we must single out for especial praise the performance by Misses Hunt, Finnemore, and the sisters Homer, of Chopin's Posthumous Mazurka, (arranged by Sir Julius Benedict for four performers on two pianofortes), and of a Lied ohne Worte (Mendelssohn), by Miss Finnemore. In short, Mr Linter's pupils did credit to themselves and their instructor, general approbation being expressed at the improvement made during the past term.

HOW THE MATTER STANDS.*

After clamouring a long time for a new Théâtre-Lyrique in Paris, we are now threatened with two Opéras-Populaires. We might almost think so, on considering the efforts made in that direction, and I believe no one would be sorry. At any rate, it may serve a purpose to acquaint your readers with the true state of the question, which, as you are aware, has its little Belgian element.

I spoke to you some time ago of a scheme for establishing a theatre on the Place de la République, on the premises of the old Grand Café-Parisien, now partly occupied by a panorama; the funds to be supplied by a syndicate of Belgian bankers and financiers, who confided the artistic interests to M. Paul Ferry, ex-dramatic agent, ex-theatrical journalist, and ex-manager of the Grand-Théâtre, Havre. M. Paul Ferry's capabilities inspired me with only very moderate confidence, and I augured nothing good for the undertaking. In this state of affairs, and when the promoters had written to the Municipal Council soliciting a grant of 300,000 francs reserved for the foundation of a Popular Opera, a new combination suddenly started up. Sig. Vianesi (formerly conductor at the Théâtre Italien) and M. Hartmann (publisher of Massenet's works) purchased from M. Ballaude (manager of the Théâtre des Nations) his lease of the building erected on the Place du Châtelet twenty years since for the Théâtre-Lyrique, when the disappearance of that theatre and of all the others resulted from the wholesale destruction by M. Haussmann of the Boulevard du Temple. Once in possession of a theatre—always a difficult thing in Paris—MM. Vianesi and Hartmann entered into partnership with M. Ritt, formerly co-manager of the Opéra-Comique with M. Leuven, in their turn soliciting the Municipal Council for the aforesaid grant—the first object naturally in the mind of every proprietor of a new lyric theatre.

Meanwhile, your compatriots, enlightened, without doubt, as to the real value of M. Paul Ferry, had somehow put him aside, but without renouncing their scheme. On the contrary, they still cherished the idea of erecting a theatre at one of the corners of the Place de la République (an excellent position, by the way, for an enterprise of this description), and it is now announced that M. Victor Jourdain, Member of the Brussels Stock Exchange, and M. Emile Lhoest, director of a financial paper, L'Economie, have come forward as direct candidates for the grant, assuring the Municipal Council that, if it is awarded, they are prepared to open their theatre on the 1st January next. Such is the state of matters at present. Which will win, the Ritt-Hartmann-Vianesi, or the Jourdain-Lhoest, combination. I am not in a position to decide; but, in the absence of other musical news, I thought that a brief review of a question affecting materially the future of musical art in France might not be uninteresting.

Arthur Pougin.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

A little bit of operatic history has just repeated itself. Years ago, when Gounod's Faust was making a sensation in Paris, the then director of Covent Garden crossed the Channel to witness it, came back, and produced something else. It is said that he thought only two numbers remarkable—the Old Men's Chorus and that for the Soldiers. Next, Mr Mapleson took note of the opera, differed in opinion from the late Mr Gye, brought it out with triumphant success, and had the satisfaction of seeing his rival follow eagerly in his wake. That is the historical episode which, with some variation, has been played all over again. Seven years have passed since another Faust—called, for distinction sake, Mefistofele, and being an amended version of a work heard at the Milan Scala in 1868—was triumphantly produced at the Teatro Comunale, Bologna. Mefistofele drew to itself no little attention at the time, and must have come within the cognizance of our English managers, whose subventionless condition enforces an "anxious polyscopity" as far as new and attractive works are concerned. Again Mr Gye let the opportunity slip, and once more Mr Mapleson seized it, bringing out Mefistofele at Her Majesty's Theatre in July, 1880, with a result which redeemed a theretofore disastrous season from utter failure. To complete the parallel, Boïto's opera was played at Covent Garden on Tuesday night, amid indications of popular satisfaction quite decided enough to warrant a belief that it will prove, like Gounod's work, a trump card in the managerial hand. Right-minded people cannot but be gratified when the claims of a good thing obtain wider and wider recognition; but in this case there are special reasons for pleasure. Only one Italian operahouse remains to us, and the production of Mefistofele at Covent Garden means nothing less than its preservation on the English stage. This is really something for which to be thankful, since Boïto's opera presents itself not only as a work containing much beauty but as a valuable exemplification of a fact which, though proved many times, seems to need proof continual, namely, that progress in lyric drama is possible on the basis of long-recognized-law.

It would be superfluous to treat Mefistofele now as a work requiring description and criticism. We discussed it to exhaustion two years ago, and it was played often enough for familiarity during the heyday of success. Enough if we indicate one or two points which will serve as reminders of the rest. The opera it may first be observed, has as much right to be called "Scenes from Goethe's Faust" as Schumann's composition of that name. Ostensibly its argument turns upon the wager made between the Powers of Good and Evil with respect to Faust, who occupies the place of Job in the Old Testament poem. Really, however, the question of the wager becomes of such secondary interest that we recognize only a group of scenes loosely connected, and each more or less dependent upon itself for interest. Dramatically, therefore, and from a constructive point of view, Mefistofele is weak. But Boïto, who, like Wagner, is his own poet, did not vainly count upon the innate resources of the portions carved by him from Goethe. He knew that the "prologue in heaven," the temptation of Faust; the garden and prison scenes; the Walpurgis Night; the classic episode on the banks of the Peneus, and the death of Faust had only to be treated in a poetic vein, with Italian vivacity and picturesqueness, in order to atone for their lack of cohesion, and leave a large balance on the side of positive merit and consequent satisfaction. That the poet composer successfully worked out his just idea need not be said. The libretto, taken scene by scene, is full of charm, and the music presents a happy blending of modern spirit with recognized form. Some observers affect to see in Mefistofele a work constructed upon Wagnerian lines. We do not deny a resemblance to certain features in Wagnerian opera, but, generally speaking, those features are no more distinctive of Wagner than of other composers his contemporaries. That there is an affinity between Mefistofele and the full-blown modern Teutonism of Tristan und Isolde we emphatically deny. The two things are wide as the poles asunder, alike in principle, practice, and effect. Boïto's opera is simply Italian opera modified according to the requirements of the present day—requirements which make servants of forms instead of permitting them to reign as masters; which give the orchestra its due place as a medium of expression, and which insist upon a connection between the word and the tone, with due regard to the essential laws of each. The success of this work is an answer to the revolutionists who would sweep away lyric drama as we know it and re-construct de novo, according to principles which are but the mushroom growth of a night. Surely far better is Mefistofele, an offshoot, fostered by the sun of to-day, from a sturdy stem rooted in the past, than the brand-new Tristan, with its philosophically recommended stage and orchestra, the one unvocal, the other "Anguished."

Boïto's work was put upon the Covent Garden stage according to a just perception of its claims. It is a spectacular opera, and as such Mr Gye treated it, doing so, moreover, with a liberality worthy the traditions of a house whose splendour is historical. Some of the scenes were magnificent, among them that of the Easter Sunday holiday at Frankfort, with its lively groups of citizens and soldiers, knights and ladies, and its stately cavalcade. Still more effective was the scene on the Brocken. This, indeed, taken with the extraordinary spectacle of the demoniacal revel, deserves a place among the greatest of stage pictures. Not further to particularize, and waiving criticism based on matters of trifling detail, it should be said that the liberality and taste of the management did all that was possible for Mefistofele, which, as a spectacle alone, is worth going to see. The orchestra and chorus had been thoroughly trained for the work they had to do, scarcely an ensemble showing signs of weakness, while some of the leading parts were capitally sustained. It will at once be assumed, and with justice, that the Marguerite of Mdme Albani was an interesting performance. Comparison is naturally invited between her conception of the part and that of Mdme Nilsson, but no need exists to enter upon it. Each lady takes her own way, and amateurs will certainly not be indisposed to follow Mdme Albani as she depicts the love and death of Goethe's pathetic heroine. The Canadian artist was most successful in the prison scene, where her dramatic intensity and power of touching expression had full swing. Few who heard it will soon forget the delivery of Marguerite's lines, in which she tells Faust of her crime, and, in distraught fashion, gives directions for the burial of herself and her victims. As Helen of Troy, Mdme Albani's task was much more easy. She sang the music with the taste and skill that never desert her, and in both characters wrote her name large upon the page which records the history of the opera. Signor Mierzwinsky being evidently indisposed, his Faust, both in a vocal and dramatic sense, may justly claim to be judged by a second hearing. M. Gailhard filled the title rôle with excellent judgment and effect. His task was most onerous and responsible, since an inferior Mefistofele is a fatal blot upon any representation of this opera, however good it may be otherwise. Specially admirable was M. Gailhard's delivery of the characteristic air in the cell scene. This stamped his performance at once as a success, and secured an encore. In the Walpurgis scene M. Gailhard was not less excellent, while, generally speaking, he proved his right to share with the creator of the part, Signor Nannetti, in the honours of a successful presentation. Mdlle Tremelli played Marta and Pantalis efficiently, and completed a quartet of artists who, in the beautiful concerted piece which ends the garden act, showed that they could work together so as to leave room for very little criticism. The success of the performance, as a whole, was undoubted, genuine applause and re-calls being frequent. For much of this result let credit be given to Signor Bevignani, who conducted with ability, and obtained the well-deserved honour of a special call.—D. T.

[The opera on Thursday was Gounod's, with Adelina Patti's Margaret—always exquisitely vocal, touching, and dramatic. Last night Mephistofele was repeated. This evening the Prophète.—D. T.]

Halévy, also, in his Etude on Cherubini, has made some remarks on Démophon which are not deficient in correctness, and which, while partly imputing the non-success of the work to the manifest weakness of the book, attribute to the musician his fair share of the failure:

" . . . . Fortune," he says, "advanced to meet the young composer. Society, the poet, and the theatre, favoured his dearest wishes. Marmontel handed over to him his book; it was a Démophon. Everything smiled on Cherubini; everything with which he had to do seemed destined to prove successful. And all did prove successful, except Démophon. Neither drawing-room triumphs, nor the favourable prepossession felt for the young beginner, nor even the real instances of merit in the music, were able to rise superior to the coldness of the subject; the composer appeared to have been frozen by the poet. I am sorry that, on coming to Paris, Cherubini fell into the hands of Morellet and Marmontel. I wish his good genius had taken him to Sedaine. The old author of Richard Cœur de Lion would have perceived what was needed by the young foreigner, anxious about the road he ought to choose; he would have supplied him with a good and thoroughly musical drama, for which Cherubini would have found grandly and nobly inspired strains. Cherubini's first essay would thus not have been wanting in brilliancy and we should possess one fine work the more. What befel Cherubini was what might befal a traveller who, cast into the midst of a great city he did not know, should ask grand nobles and clever people, who never went out except in a carriage, to tell him the way; though actuated by perfect good faith, they might very well direct him wrongly and cause him to go astray. A good member of the middle classes who goes on foot and walks about the streets, is worth a hundred times as much."

"There was, certainly, great instrumental merit in Démophon. There were some fine choruses. The composer was already laying the foundations of a new school and style. But the public could not appreciate these things, and then there was the absence of inspiration. I wish, for Cherubini's sake, that he had been advised by some one not to break abruptly and totally with his beautiful Italian school. Had the subject he was treating allowed him to put in his new opera pieces like the trio in his Ifigenia in Aulide, or in the style of the quartets he was at that very moment writing for I Viaggiatori felici and for Gazzaniga's Don Juan, his success would have been immense."

It is certain that one of the causes which brought about the non-success of Démophon is attributable to hesitation on the part of the musician. Despite his Italian descent, Cherubini may be reckoned among the successors of Gluck. With a mind full of the effects of the revolution which dramatic music had just undergone in France, placing himself on the side of the reformers, and according dramatic expression all the importance it deserved and which people were beginning to give it, he wanted, suddenly, without gradual transition or preparation, to abandon the purely Italian style he had previously followed, and openly display the flag of the new school. But he could not execute his project without feeling his way a little, while, moreover, despite himself, the old Adam sometimes re-appeared, and was seen sacrificing, almost without suspecting it, to the gods of his early years. Hence certain discrepancies and an inevitable inequality in the entirety, as such, of his work, which appeared somewhat composite, and in which, on account of too great an amount of reflection, the inspiration lacked abundance and spontaneity. At a later period, after this first attempt to fuse Italian melodic richness and French dramatic reason, when he shall have acquired the suppleness and firmness in which he is yet deficient, Cherubini will write the beautiful and powerful works Lodoïska, Médée, and Les Deux Journées, which characterize his virile genius and have placed him so high in public esteem. After all, if we pre-suppose the direction taken by his mind on his arrival in France, he could not do otherwise than write a Démophon, or some equivalent score, that is to say—a work of transition and compromise, of a somewhat hybrid character, and forming, as it were, the connecting link, the suture, between his purely Italian, and his genuinely French, career. Henceforth, sure of himself and inured by this first battle, he will have no more hesitation, but march with a firm step to the conquest of the new countries of which he has caught a glance and which he is eager to possess.*

* Castil-Blaze has well indicated the hesitation characterizing Cherubini's first attempt in France: "Démophon marks the epoch when the musician changed his style. The author has not yet any settled system; the beginner navigates his bark between Gluck and Piccinni. His airs, graceful and tender in expression, belong to the Italian manner, which he abandons directly a strong situation arises. We then have Gluck with all his vigour and animation, but with more elegant forms, as well as a richer and more varied orchestra." (L'Académie imperiale de musique, tome I, page 509.)

V.

The mediocre result obtained from the production of Démophon was not calculated greatly to facilitate Cherubini's settling in Paris. He has himself described in the following terms the details of his position at this epoch:

"In 1786, I returned from London, where I stopped two years to write operas. On reaching Paris I went to my friend Viotti, with whom I resided down to 1791. I first supported myself on what I earned in London, but that was not much, and then on the trifle for which I agreed to write an opera in 1787 at Turin. On coming back to Viotti's in Paris, I composed Démophon, which was played at the Grand Opera in December, 1788. This work gave me author's rights, which did not bring in much, seeing that it was performed only eight times, and that even the little I made was swallowed up by what I had to expend for having unluckily taken it into my head to have the opera engraved at my own cost."†

The young composer's position was, therefore, not brilliant, and, while writing a Cantata entitled Circé, which, at the commencement of 1789, was sung by Rousseau at one of the concerts of the Olympic Lodge, he was not perhaps quite free from anxiety as to his future prospects in Paris.‡ Fortunately, an extremely important artistic event, with which Viotti was directly mixed up, was destined to afford him temporarily a certain livelihood and obtain him a position worthy of himself. I allude to the establishment of the Théâtre de Monsieur, which forms a date in the theatrical and musical history of France. Besides the three great theatres, the Opera, the Comédie-Francaise, and the Comédie-Italienne, (the last of which was beginning to be designated also by the name of the Théâtre Favart), frequented exclusively by the artistic and literary public, there was scarcely in Paris at this epoch half a dozen theatres. They were the Variétés-Amusantes, situated at the corner of the Rue de Lancry and the Rue de Bondy, that is, right on the Boulevard; the Théâtre des Beaujolais, which occupied in the Palais Royal the site on which now stands the theatre bearing the latter name; the Ambigu-Comique, directed by Audinot; the Grands-Danseurs du Roi, under the management of Nicolet, which afterwards became the Gaité; and, lastly, on the Boulevard du Temple, and quite near that edifice, the two small theatres, the Associés and the Délassements-Comiques. Astley's Circus, Séraphin's Ombres-Chinoises, Curtius's Exhibition of Waxwork, and two or three establishments of the same kind completed the series of public amusements offered to the Parisians, then, as now, madly fond of the stage; but, as we see, there were no more than nine real theatres opening their doors regularly to the public. It was then that a person, whom we certainly should not have expected to see in such a matter, thought of endowing Paris with a dramatic establishment such as Paris had never seen. This person, whose name was Léonard Autié, commonly known as Léonard, was the hairdresser of the young Queen, Marie Antoinette. Being very devoted to her (so much so, that he was mixed up, some few years later, in the episode of the flight to Varennes), he was not without a certain influence at Court, so that through the patronage of the Queen and of Monsieur, the Comte de Provence, brother to the King, and subsequently Louis XVIII., he obtained the patent for a new theatre, which was to be called the Théâtre de Monsieur, and in which three different kinds of entertainment—Italian opera, French opera, and comedy—were to be played simultaneously. But, when he had once his patent in his pocket, Léonard was doubtless rather puzzled. Such an affair was no trifling matter, and some experience in these things was necessary to set it going and manage it properly. Like a sensible man, Léonard went to Viotti, whom he had probably known at Court, and proposed that he should join him in the management of the new enterprize.

† These lines are not taken from the Notice dictated to de Beauchesne, but from an authographic note written by Cherubini after the Revolution of 1830, and bearing the title: Note relative à L. Cherubini, rédigée par luiméme. This short autobiography contains scarcely four pages, and it is easy to see from the trembling and uncertain writing that he who penned it was seventy years old.

‡ This Cantata was again sung by Rousseau at a concert given in the Pantheon for the benefit of the celebrated vocalist, Mdme Todi.

SALE OF AUTOGRAPHS.—An important sale of musical autographs took place the other day at Leipsic. Among the nine volumes, containing nearly 500 pages of sketches and scores by Beethoven, the manuscript of a triumphal march, the draughts of the symphony in C minor, of the music for Egmont, the Eighth Symphony, and the overture to Leonore, brought the largest sums, except one volume of eight pages, containing an orchestral march ("Zapfenstreich"), never printed, Mozart, Haydn, and Schubert, Weber, Liszt, and Chopin, did not excite very lively competition, autographs by the last named being bought by an agent of the Duc d'Aumale. The twelve autograph works of Mendelssohn, however, were eagerly bidden for. An unprinted chorus—"Jesus, my joy"—with orchestral accompaniment, was bought by a publishing house of Leipsic, and two compositions, an Andante and a Presto with adagio, never printed; bearing the date, "London, July 25, 1833," were secured in behalf of English collectors said to be closely connected with Royalty. Among the autograph letters were some by Meyerbeer, Auber, Verdi, Thalberg, William Sterndale Bennett, Jenny Lind, Napoleon I., Queen Victoria (in French), Queen Marie Therese, Johannes Huss, Lafayette, Marquise de Maintenon, Prince Talleyrand, Wallenstein, Charles Dickens, Georges Sand, Dumas the elder, Goethe, Victor Hugo, Humboldt, Linné, Schiller, and Voltaire.

A FEW STATISTICS.—Some of the Paris papers recently published the salaries received by the leading artists of the Grand Opera. The statements, says La Musique Populaire, are erroneous. The following are, according to the paper in question, the correct figures, but the reader must bear in mind that the artists are not paid when absent on holidays. Mdme Krauss gains 15,000 francs a month, that is, with a four-months' holiday, 120,000 frcs. a year; Mdlle Salla has 10,000 frcs. a month, with a two months' holiday, i.e., 100,000 frcs. a year; Mdlle Richard, 3,000 frcs. a month, with a month's holiday, i.e., 33,000 frcs. a year; M. Lassalle, 12,000 frcs. a month, with a holiday of three months and a half; M. Maurel, 10,000 frcs. a month for five months; M. Villaret, 5,000 frcs. a month, or 60,000 frcs. a year; and M. Sellier 55,000 frcs. a year.—Here are last winter's receipts of the principal Paris concerts. Eighteen concerts given by the Société des Concerts du Conservatoire produced from 140,000 to 150,000 frcs.; Pasdeloup's Popular Concerts, 114,461 frcs., or, as there were four-and-twenty concerts, an average of 4,769 frcs. for each one; M. E. Colonne, with twenty-two concerts, took 133,390 frcs., or an average of rather more than 6,060 frcs. a concert; M. Lamoureux, with twenty-three concerts, took 62,000, or an average of 2,700 frcs. a concert. The receipts at M. E. Broustet's Grands Concerts are not exactly known, but may be considered something between 30.000 and 35,000 frcs. Adding up the above, we find the sum paid by the Parisians during the period mentioned for Sunday concerts amounted to something like half a million francs, or £20,000.

MUSIC AT BOULOGNE-SUR-MER.

The season has begun. The Etablissement and the Theatre have commenced their usual summer attractions. At the former, concerts are given from four to five in the afternoon, and in the evening a military band performs in the Kioske, under the direction of a new chef, M. Etesse, late bandmaster of the 8th line regiment, of which a battalion is always quartered here, and who, at the musical competition at Calais on Sunday week, conducted the Boulogne Société Comunale, which carried off the first prize of 400 francs (£16) and a large gold medal. At the Theatre M. Bérard, well known in Boulogne as an excellent actor, and whose name I mentioned favourably in The Musical World several times during the seasons of 1879 and 1880—has undertaken the management with the aid of an excellent troupe of artists, an efficient band, a good chorus, and accessories. On Saturday the opera was Lucie, the principal characters being well rendered by Mdlle Levasseur (1re chanteuse légere du Grand Theatre, Bordeaux), M. Solve (barytone from the Lyrique), and Walter, an old friend here. Le Barbiere was the opera last night, when Mdlle Levasseur charmed her audience as Rosina, giving in the Lesson Scene the Shadow Song from Dinorah with excellent effect. M. Idrac (tenor, from the Opéra Comique), was Almaviva; M. Solve, the barber; M. Degrave (from La Haye), Bazillio; and M. Walter, Dr Bartholo. Altogether, we must bid a hearty welcome to M. Bérard, and congratulate him on the efficiency of his troupe. Faust is to be given to-morrow, and several novelties are in preparation. There was a performance on Friday, by a Parisian troupe, of Serge Panine, of which, probably, you have heard.

Elleviou's glory still survives, though it is seventy years since the admirable artist left the stage. He has remained the model, the type, of an Opéra-Comique tenor, and we may unfortunately say that, while many tenors have succeeded him since 1812—the year of his retirement—no one has filled his place; not even Ponchard and not even Roger, despite the immense talent exhibited by each of the two. An exquisite actor and an accomplished singer, whose voice was something marvellous, and, moreover, handsome, elegant, and possessed of a fine figure, Elleviou united in himself a combination of qualities such as has never again been known.†

But he was not merely a great artist, and it is not of the singer that I shall speak to-day. He was, also, a kind-hearted, good, generous, and benevolent man, and the well-authenticated anecdote I am about to relate will furnish a convincing proof of this. Since the date of its first publication it has been related of several famous singers, but it is true exclusively of Elleviou, and it is right to render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's. The following is the way in which the occurrence is described by a biographer. The scene was laid in the year X (1801), one fine summer's evening in the Champs Elysées, where a poor blind man used every day to instal himself before a wretched harpsichord, from which he drew discordant sounds for the purpose of exciting the charity of the public, with whom the magnificent site was then, as now, a favourite walk:—

One evening the unfortunate virtuoso, having exhausted his repertory, took up his bowl and shook it, but no sound greeted his ear in return. Hereupon he began desperately striking chords, then, folding his arms, he uttered, as a last cry of distress, the words, interrupted by sighs: "Nothing, good Heavens! Nothing, nothing, nothing! Who will help me to-day?" Suddenly a prodigy interrupted his sighs and lamentations. The keyboard, which his fingers no longer touched, sang an air unknown to him, and sang it, too, with a purity and breadth of sound which moved, as though under the influence of an awakening soul, all the fibres of the wretched instrument, causing them to vibrate harmoniously. The beggar-artist, astounded, uncertain, and charmed, did not dare stretch out his hand to make sure the miracle was real, but a woman's gentle voice whispered in his ear: "If you would vacate your chair, my dear colleague, our friend could continue his sonata more conveniently." More and more surprised, the blind man rose mechanically, and, guided by the lady, went and leaned on the breast-high railing which enclosed the cross-walk of the Cours-la-Reine. He was fortunate to occupy a position beyond which he could not be forced to go, for the few passers-by whom the remarkable talent of his substitute on the harpsichord had attracted were soon joined by a great many more, who enlarged the circle of listeners, augmented every moment by a fast accumulating crowd who streamed from all quarters to the point of attraction. On the approach of the first to arrive, the lady lowered her veil. She wore with much distinction a costume of irreproachable elegance. While the pianist, with his head bent down over the keyboard, continued to pour forth the pearls which stream through Steibelt's "Orage," the admiration of all eyes was divided between the young veiled lady and a charming fellow standing at the other side of the harpsichord. From time to time, he glanced over the crowd without impertinence but without embarrassment, like one accustomed to look people in the face. Though scrupulously dressed as a most refined Incroyable, he justified, by the ease of his movements and the gracefulness of his attitude, the follies of the fashion. The pianist finished the sonata and the applause burst forth. He raised his head and took off his hat to bow. He was the youngest of the three. "Really, he does not look eighteen," remarked one of the crowd. "He is one-and-twenty," answered a neighbour.—"Do you know him?"—"There are a good many of us who do, but all Paris is acquainted with the other." The questioner was about to continue but his neighbour, nudging him with his elbow, said: "Silence, the other is going to sing." Accompanied by the young pianist, the charming Incroyable sang the romance, "Une fièvre brûlante," from Richard Cœur de Lion. There was but one cry of enthusiasm from all present; only those in the front row could applaud; the others, too close together to clap their hands, adopted another plan: with an arm held up in the air, the women waved their handkerchiefs and the men their hats, which they stuck on the ends of their sticks. "I am fond of music and have heard the king of tenors at the Salle Feydeau, but I assure you Elleviou does not sing better," continued the person whose questions had been stopped a short time previous. And from mouth to mouth there reached the speaker the answer his neighbour had just given. "It is Elleviou! it is Elleviou!" The young veiled lady, without being troubled by the general emotion, went round the crowd. Holding out her hand to each person, she said: "For a poor blind artist, if you please." When she had finished, she went up to the blind man and delivered into his hands what she had collected. Tears filled his eyes. "It is not your charity which makes me weep," he said, "but what I have just heard." While the money was being collected, the pianist and the singers, avoiding the ovations with which they were threatened by numerous enthusiasts, made good their escape; the lady, who knew where to find them, managing to glide among the crowd, disappeared.

I asserted that the anecdote is true and I will now prove it is. To be assured of this, we have only to look through the papers of the day, which describe the occurrence with all kinds of details. But there is something better than this. After the papers the stage got hold of it and it was put to account by three vaudeville writers, Viellard, Lafortelle, and Chazet, in a short piece entitled Le Concert aux Champs-Elysées and played at the Théâtre Montansier. In it Elleviou appeared under the name of Blinval; his wife, under that of Mdme Blinval; and Pradher, under that of Dupré, the three characters being sustained by Frédéric, the charming Caroline, and Xavier. The authors when publishing their piece headed it with the following notice, which cannot leave any doubt in our mind: "Elleviou was walking not long since in the Champs-Elysées with his wife, and Louis Pradher. Suddenly they stopped before a blind man, who was playing very indifferently on a bad instrument, but without obtaining anything from the pity of the public. Pradher took possession of the instrument, Elleviou sang, and his wife went round to solicit donations. They were soon recognized but they collected 36 francs which they handed the poor artist and then withdrew from the applause of the spectators. Such is the act of charity represented at the Théâtre Montansier. The authors are far from attributing the success of their little piece to its own merit; so pretty a picture required only a frame and the subject was a success in itself." Another piece, Le Forte-Piano ou une Soirée de bienfaisance aux Champs-Elysées, inspired by the same incident, was played at the same time at the little Théâtre Mareux, situate in the Rue Saint-Antoine. Lastly, after the papers and the theatres, engraving in its turn appropriated the little episode, and Duplessi-Berteaux, one of the most justly famous artists of the period, published a curious plate, now become exceedingly rare, representing the concert in the Champs-Elysées, which is assuredly an interesting reminiscence from the life of a celebrated artist.

Royal Academy of Music.—The competition for the Parepa-Rosa gold medal took place on Monday. The examiners were Messrs Pinsuti, Visetti, and Carl Rosa (Chairman). There were seven candidates, and the medal was awarded to Miss Hilda Wilson.

She sat down at the piano and cleared her throat. Her first selection was: "I cannot sing the old songs," and a gloom, colder and bleaker than a Sunday dinner in a pious family, fell on the company, when the stranger in the corner said: "And we trust you are not familiar with the new ones."—(Worst and worst!—Dr Blitge.)

The Late Mr Webster.—The remains of Mr Benjamin Webster were buried on Thursday at Brompton Cemetery. The hearse was followed by three mourning carriages, containing Mr William J. Webster, Mrs Webster, Mr Edward Lawson, Mr Arthur Webster, Mr Benjamin Webster, jun., Mr Harry Lawson, Mr Johnson, Mr Alfred Webster, Mr Frank Webster. The coffin was of plain English oak, with brass mountings, and was covered with flowers. The plate bore the following inscription:—"Benjamin Webster, Actor, born September 3, 1797, died July 8, 1882." The chapel was filled with members of the theatrical profession. The grave is near to that of Miss Neilson.

I SAW THY RAVEN HAIR.

A HEBREW MELODY.

I saw thy raven hair
Bound by a jewell'd band,
And many a circlet fair
Was on thy beauteous hand,
And a bright chain of Ophir's gold
Was round thy neck of Phidian mould.

I saw those tresses twine
Around thy forehead even;
I saw thy dark eyes shine
As blaze the stars in heaven;
I gazed upon thy bosom fair,
And not one thorn, one grief was there.

I saw that bosom's snow
Stain'd by the crimson gore;
I heard that voice in woe,
That sang so sweet before;
I saw thy raven tresses torn,
I heard thee made the ruffian's scorn.

I saw thy beauties sold
To heed the Sclavonian beck,
And for thy chain of gold
Was iron round thy neck;
But tho' they might to slavery send,
Thy lofty soul they could not bend.

No; they who were thy lords
Might sharpen sorrow's dart,
And they might tear the chords
That bound thy noble heart.
But unto them it was not given
To keep thy soul from finding heaven.

Dedicated to Sir Moses Montefiore by Wellington Guernsey.

It is my duty no less than my pleasure to encourage ladies in all their artistic efforts."—"Lady's Pictorial," July 15, 1882.

"Miss Albrecht is not only a pianist of remarkable power and ability but a composer of very elegant music for her 'instrument de prédilection.' This spirited 'Martial Fantasia,' in G major, boldly asserts its title, and is indeed a stirring effusion, that might be made effective, in score, for a military band. The piece is no child's play, but will require study. The staccato octave passages alone supply work for fire-eating players."—"Musical Standard," May, 1882.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE.
For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.
DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. Sold in boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d., by all Chemists throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The second performance of M. Lenepveu's Velleda confirmed the impression derived from the first. Though it can in no instance be accused of startling originality, it is a work of real merit, declaring the hand of one who in the art of construction, writing for voices, and orchestral scoring, has a genuine claim to appreciation. Individuality may come later, which is frequently the case, and it is worth remembering that Auber himself was past forty when he produced La Muette de Portici. Meanwhile, Velleda has furnished Mdme Adelina Patti with a new character, which enables her further to demonstrate, not only her singular versatility, but also her remarkable aptitude for the fresh line she has lately adopted, as prima donna in opera tragica, which began with Semiramide, and will doubtless lead to Norma, where a still wider field is open for the exhibition of her unquestionable dramatic powers. In Mdme Valleria, who plays Ina, Velleda's attendant Druidess, Mdme Patti has a worthy associate; and the other leading parts are more than adequately sustained by Mdlle Stahl, Signors Nicolini and Cotogni. The second performance was a manifest improvement upon the first. La Traviata was repeated last week, with Mdme Patti as Violetta, more brilliant and animated in the earlier scenes, more impassioned in those which follow, than ever. Signor Nicolini's Alfredo and Signor Cotogni's Giorgio Germont were material aids to the strength of the "cast."

The production of Arrigo Boïto's Mefistofele at Covent Garden was an important pledge on the part of the manager, and has been fulfilled in accordance with the known traditions of the theatre over which Mr Gye now rules, as worthy successor to a worthy progenitor. About the opera itself enough was said on the occasion of its production, by Mr Mapleson, at Her Majesty's Theatre, when, in the part of Margherita, Mdme Christine Nilsson won fresh laurels. It was with a view to the co-operation of Mdme Nilsson that Boïto's work had been advertised at the eleventh hour; but the treaty with that popular lady falling through, for reasons which only concern those directly concerned, the leading responsibility—that of impersonating Margaret in the first, and Helen of Troy in the second division of the opera—devolved upon the always ready and never yet unsuccessful Emma Albani, who, in the circumstances, must be warmly congratulated on the fact that she had in no way over-estimated her capacity for the task. To forget the Margaret of Mdme Nilsson is barely possible; all the more honour, therefore, to Mdme Albani for stamping the character with her own graceful individuality, and, in accordance with a poetic ideal everywhere consistent, embodying it from end to end in so thoroughly engaging a manner. The opera is by many, especially among the disciples of Richard Wagner, looked upon as a new revelation. We are unable, nevertheless, to esteem it so highly; and the idea of ranking it, in a musical sense, above the Faust of M. Gounod, little as that—a real masterpiece in its way—reflects the normal conception of Goethe, appears to us a sheer absurdity. It has much of the mechanical trickery of Wagner, with but a small modicum of Wagner's depth; for it should be understood that Wagner is not to be imitated with impunity, that his complex and almost inscrutable brain defies analysis, and that for a feebler intellect to follow in his wake is something equivalent to an inexperienced mountaineer attempting to dog the steps of Mr Whymper over some of the most formidable Alpine or Caucasian passes, without a rope to save him from the dangers of crevasses. Signor Boïto (who, like Wagner, prepares his own librettos) is, more or less, in such a predicament. Nevertheless, there are some exceedingly attractive passages in his Mefistofele; and among these may be cited parts of the prologue, and especially the final chorus; parts of the Easter Sunday scene which opens Act 1; the quartet in Act 2, for Margaret, Faust, Martha, and Mephistopheles; portions of the soliloquy of Margaret; and the duet with Faust, which, in Act 3, leads up to the death of Margaret; the duet for Helen and Pantalis, at the beginning of Act 4, which, though insignificant in dimensions, is invitingly melodious, &c. On the other hand, almost the entire scene of the night on the Brocken is illustrated by music verging closely on the pantomimic, and the more disheartening from the fact that the chorus and dance of witches, &c., bringing it to a climax, is a caricature of one of the most impressive and masterly passages in the Walpurgis Night of Mendelssohn, which to a disciple of Wagner should, one might think, have been forbidden, if only because (Wagnerially) occupying unsanctified ground. On the whole, Mefistofele is got up at the Royal Italian Opera in a style creditable to the establishment and its vast resources. Mdlle Tremelli is an excellent Martha; M. Gailhard a thoroughly French Mephistopheles, a sort of distant reflection of M. Faure; and M. Mierzwinsky, when his voice is in a little better order, and more at command than at the first performance, should be a really acceptable Faust. The orchestra and chorus, under the direction of Signor Bevignani, went through their arduous duties with unflagging spirit. With regard to mise-en-scène, it is only justice to name the "Easter day fête" and the "Walpurgis Night" as entitling M. Lapissida, the stage manager, to unqualified approval.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

(From the "Musical Standard.")

As the Royal College of Music is still in matters of detail an unfinished structure, the world is naturally and properly in the "Audi alteram partem" attitude; and the most important oracle concerned—the professional musical world—has maintained so far a marked silence, not strangely, when it is borne in mind that the professional dictum, without which no success can be complete or assured, has has not yet been really asked for. Still, strong currents may be indicated by straws, and here and there musicians are quietly expressing their opinions upon the important scheme now before the nation, in the new Royal College. It is indeed to the advantage of the scheme to ventilate all honest thought upon its foundation lines and future prospects. One great difficulty to be got over is the somewhat paternal nature of the scheme. On the Continent this difficulty does not exist in the same degree as here, young men being not only willing, but even proud of a State education. The feeling in England, on the other hand, is chiefly in favour of the exercise of educational functions, apart from State connections. As an illustration of this feeling, a distinguished English musician points out the position of the Board School system, which though widely differing from the platform upon which the Royal College will stand, has nevertheless, in common with the new royal institution, the application of the principal of a State-paid education. Now, the Board Schools have actually gained strength and respect, from the fact that a charge, even though little more than nominal, has been made, by which the national spirit of self-aid and manly independence has been met and conciliated. It is therefore of extreme importance that the authorities of the Royal College become fully assured of the public acceptance of the Continental and paternal plan which forms the basis of their scheme, and which has hitherto had no complete and successful application here. The collegiate system, which just now holds the approval of the English people, has no sign of State patronage, and its distinctions do not involve the notion of State support. Indeed, as the generic title College has been accepted, it might be well to assimilate the educational and diploma schemes of the new institution to the popularly accepted lines of our national collegiate system.

DITTERSDORF v. MOZART.

The 12th of the present month was the 100th anniversary of Mozart's Belmonte und Constanze, oder Die Entführung aus dem Serail, the first performance having taken place in Vienna on the 12th July, 1782, with Mdlle Cavalieri as Constanza, Mdlle Teyber as Blondchen, Herren Adamberger, Dauer, Walter, and Fischer, as Belmonte, Pedrillo, Selim Bassa, and Osmin. At Berlin the opera was performed for the first time on the 16th October, 1788, in the then "Royal and National Theatre." Mdme Unzelmann was Constanza; Mdme Baranius, Blondchen; Herr Lippert, Belmonte; Herr Greibe, Pedrillo; Herr Czechtitzky, Selim Bassa; and Herr Frankenberg, Osmin. The success was as great in Berlin as it had been in Vienna, though there was no want of carping criticism. It seems comical now to read the notice written by a critic of the day, who tells "the young man" (Mozart) that "he had better have taken a few lessons from Dittersdorf before venturing on the composition of a comic opera."

Memorial Service in Westminster Abbey.—The music to the hymn, "Comes at times," &c., sung on Tuesday, is by Sir Herbert Oakeley.

The task of turning into Italian the book of M. Ambroise Thomas's Françoise de Rimini has been entrusted to Zanardini, of Milan, who wrote the Italian version of Delibes's Jean de Nivelle.

Viotti, who united with his admirable artistic faculties legitimate ambition, and who had besides all his life a taste and fondness for the stage, saw at once of what extension Léonard's project was capable. He did not hesitate, therefore, accepting the proposal Léonard made him, and at the very outset embarked all his personal property in the business. The Court then resided at Versailles, and the Tuileries were occupied by Monsieur, who granted the new enterprise placed under his patronage the privilege of using the Theatre there. This privilege was "assured for thirty years by an order in council," with "the unconditional consent of the King."* A joint-stock company was soon formed, and four of its members, expressly chosen by Monsieur, were to manage the different departments. The first thing was to make the necessary repairs to the house, and these did not cost less than 250,000 livres. The next thing was to get together the artists—no easy task at a theatre where the different styles of entertainment were so strongly defined that it required three complete companies. No Italian singers had been heard in Paris for ten years, when De Vismes, manager of the Opera, sent for an excellent company, who gave a long series of profitable performances at that theatre. Viotti, who understood such things, undertook himself to go to Italy, and beat up the necessary artistic recruits; he brought back the most admirable company that had ever appeared in France. To prove this, it is sufficient to cite the still famous names of Mandini, Viganoni, Raffanelli, Mengozzi, Rovedino, and of the Signore Morichelli, Baletti, and Mandini, whose success was immense from their very first appearance, and who, for nearly four years, did not cease to excite the enthusiasm of the public. As for the French opera company, it was more especially composed of young artists, but here again the management had been lucky, for with Mdmes Ponteuil, Lesage, and Verteuil, they engaged Martin, whose reputation was to be so rapidly established; Gaveaux, an excellent musician, who united to his theatrical capability remarkable talent as a composer; Lesage, whose career was to be prolonged during more than thirty years; Saint-Aubin; and some others. Lastly, the spoken drama brought together the highly respectable names of Paillardelle, an excellent actor and distinguished dramatic writer; of Saint-Preux, Berville, Pélissier; of Mdmes Pélissier, Dumont, Deschamps, &c. Directly the scenic staff was thoroughly complete in all its departments, attention was paid to the orchestra, and here Viotti's intelligent influence was felt to such an extent that from the very first the band at the Théâtre de Monsieur was considered by all amateurs as the first in Paris, and preferred even to that of the Opera. But then it comprised a number of first-class virtuosos, most of whom were also distinguished composers, such as Rode (1st violin), Baillot (2nd violin), Hugot (1st flute), Charles Duvernoy (1st clarinet), Devienne and Delcambre (bassoons), Othon and Frédéric Duvernoy (1st horns), Schmerzka (1st violoncello), &c. This orchestra had for its first conductor an exceptional artist, Mestrino; then, after his death (July, 1789), Bruni; and afterwards Puppo and La Houssaye conjointly.† Lastly, Viotti, who shared with Léonard and a certain Desarènes, the title and functions of administrator, and had confided those of director-general to Martini, Superintendant of the King's Music and author of "Plaisir d'amour," as well as of several charming operas, chose as accompanists on the piano two pleasing composers, Ferrari and Jadin, reserving a particularly important part for his friend Cherubini. The latter was intrusted with the highest direction of musical matters, as well as with the mission of watching over the studies of the artists, of undertaking the modifications it might be deemed useful to make in the Italian works produced, and lastly, of composing the new numbers thought necessary to be interpolated in them.

At the end of 1788, the Théâtre de Monsieur, solidly constituted in every department, was ready to open its doors to the public, but the rigour of an exceptional winter obliged it to defer for a few weeks its inauguration, which could not take place before the 26th January, 1789, when Le Vicende amorose, an opera by Tritta, was performed.‡ It was an event in Paris, and high society, excited at one and the same time by Monsieur's patronage of the enterprise, and attracted by the excellence of the entertainment, continually varied and always interesting, soon flocked in crowds to the new house, which quickly became their favourite place of meeting. Despite the cruel anxieties of a period fertile in violent shocks, things at first went on brilliantly. It must be stated, also, that the activity of the management was so prodigious, that, despite their being compelled to close temporarily three times, on the first occasion, for the regular Easter holidays; on the second, by the events which brought about the taking of the Bastille; and, on the third, by the necessity of a change of locality, they found means during the first year to get up and offer the public more than forty works, among which were about twenty French or Italian operas. The reader will easily believe that activity like this, constantly introducing into the repertory a variety which kept public curiosity always excited, was well calculated to enforce attention, and enlist general sympathy in favour of so active and intelligent an enterprise. But the management were not contented with being merely active and intelligent; with these two great qualities they combined rare modesty and a profound respect for the public, a fact of which we may convince ourselves by a perusal of the complimentary address delivered, according to custom, on the 28th March, by the actor, Saint-Preux, in his capacity of semainier before the theatre closed at Easter:

"Gentlemen, if the constant efforts we have made to please you and the most persevering zeal to merit your favour had sufficed to render us worthy of it, we might, on coming to-day to claim your indulgence, venture to think we had in some sort deserved it; but (and we cannot dissimulate the fact) the marks of encouragement with which you have deigned to honour us could be only the effect of the kindly patronage to which talent always owes its birth. If this Theatre ever prove really worthy of ministering to your pleasure, you will be able to say, Gentlemen, that you are enjoying your own work; having sustained its infancy, you will have a right in future to insist on efforts proportioned to greater resources and more solid strength. It will not be long ere we present you with a more amply developed plan. We expect from Italy several artists whose success in the first cities of Europe may, perhaps, be taken as a guarantee of that which awaits them here. French opera, too, will be reinforced by some actors now playing leading business in the principal provincial towns. Lastly, the dramatic company, which, in consequence of its including so few persons, has hitherto not been worthy your attention, is likewise completed. On re-opening, we shall, therefore, be able to place in our repertory works more in keeping with your taste and delicacy. We beg you consequently, Gentlemen, to continue to extend towards us a little longer that indulgence of which you have already deigned to give us so many proofs, and we venture to assure you that we will omit nothing to deserve it." §

SCHNAITH (Würtemberg).—A memorial to Friedrich Silcher, the well-known "Folk's-Composer"—executed in light sandstone by Dietelbach of Stuttgart, and affixed to the front of the house in which he was born—was formally inaugurated on the 29th June. It consists of a medallion portrait, surmounted by a tablet on which is a laurel-entwined lyre, with the following inscription: "In this Schoolhouse, on the 27th June, 1789, was born Dr Friedrich Silcher, Music-Director in the Royal University, Tubingen, where he died on the 26th August, 1860. Dedicated to his Memory by his Admirers."

† We read in a special collection (Almanach général des spectacles) the following lines relative to the orchestra at the Théâtre de Monsieur: "There is no one with a bâton at this theatre, because real musicians do not require to have the time marked for them (?); the Italians especially are so accustomed to precision, and their ear is so sure in this respect, that they would think any one who offered to beat time for them was laughing at them. Frenchmen, less at home in music, require backing up by a donkey leader (guide-âne). Hence it often happens that an actor attentive to the bâton, and always fearful of going wrong, sacrifices taste, passion, and acting to vocal mechanism." I think, despite the originality of these reflections, there was a rapid return at the Théâtre de Monsieur, as elsewhere, to the conducting-stick and traditional customs.

‡ From the 1st to the 8th January, 1789, the Journal de Paris simply inserts this announcement in its daily theatrical advertisements: "THEATRE DE MONSIEUR. The opening is inevitably postponed, owing to the extreme rigour of the cold." Then there is no further reference to the subject till the day of the inauguration, when the programme is thus simply worded: "THEATRE DE MONSIEUR. To-day, the 26th, for the opening, Le Vicende amorose, opera-buffa, music del Signor Tritta."

FORM, OR DESIGN, IN VOCAL MUSIC.

After the overture has prepared our minds, and put them into a state ripe for the reception of the story, the scene opens with the courtyard of a prison; the prison walls, high gates, and outer walls enclosing the scene. Against this sombre background a great deal of simple chatter is carried on between the porter Jacquino and the gaoler's daughter Marcellina. The music of this scene is simple and delicate—befitting the airy chatter of the two who are thinking of little but their love-making and love-refusing, and of their daily work, opening gates and ironing linen; but strangely at variance with the thoughts that were put into our minds by the overture, and still kept up by the sight of the prison walls. The duet with which the chatter is woven is in rhythmic form, with much imitation of a light character. It is a sonata, of which the first subject is allotted to Jacquino's request for a chat, and Marcellina's answer:

Ex. 183.

the second subject, in E, is Jacquino's stammering proposal of marriage:

Ex. 184.

This subject makes its close in E, when Jacquino is obliged to go away to open the door. In these two subjects the ideas, musical as well as poetical, are continuous; and in each subject the idea belonging to it is worked to its natural development. A second part follows, with many changing thoughts and corresponding changes of musical idea and key. Jacquino's absence allows Marcellina's thoughts to rest upon Fidelio, on whom she has set her heart, who, as we know, is Leonora the wife, in man's dress, seeking her imprisoned husband. This has a fresh musical idea in a new key. Jacquino's return to love-making, and Marcellina's greater repugnance to it, is allotted to a new use of the first subject in new keys, as in the second part of sonatas. The first subject having been made great use of here, no return to it is made in the recapitulation, but only the second subject is used for that, and in conjunction with a repetition of Jacquino's proposal. The recapitulation of the second subject is an exact transposition into A, the main key, of the harmonies and general effect of the music that was before in E (see Ex. 184), up to the point of the knocking interruption. At the repetition of the knocking the coda begins, which is in quicker time, and in duet; the thoughts being the joy of the girl and the vexation of the man at the interruption. A busy, bustling undercurrent is carried on throughout the piece in the accompaniment, principally with imitations of the little subject (a) (see Ex. 184); and, in fact, the accompaniment of this piece has more real musical importance than the voice parts.

After the duet is some spoken dialogue. Rocco calls from the back; Jacquino dislikes going, and Marcellina urges him. In the old Italian style this would be set to speaking recitative, and in the grand opera it would be accompanied recitative, but we cannot but feel that the words are matter-of-fact, and not matter of sentiment, and are at least as appropriate to speech. Though the use of music throughout makes a more perfect whole, the use of occasional speech gives a certain relief to the attention.

The next number, being in C minor, is not connected in key with the previous, but probably it was felt that the spoken dialogue bridged over the gap between the two. Jacquino has gone away, and Marcellina very naturally dreams over the lover Fidelio. She is a simple maiden, and her thoughts come in simple form. Her song is a ballad with minor strain and major strain; the whole repeated for a second verse of words, and a coda added.

After Marcellina's song there is dialogue between Marcellina, Fidelio, Jacquino, and Rocco; and from this grows a quartet, in which they each think—aloud to the audience, but aside from one another—of the different aspects in which the situation appears to them. Marcellina hopes for Fidelio's love; Fidelio is troubled by Marcellina's love for her; Jacquino is jealous, but still hopeful; Rocco approves. Here the thought of each one can be dwelt upon, and turned over and over again; and, therefore, they fit into a rhythmic formulated movement. Again, the thought of each one bears upon the same subject—the marriage of Fidelio and Marcellina; and, therefore, they accord with the canonic form, in which each part has the same musical idea. The movement is a canon of the form of the old English round. The voices enter successively with the same melody after each preceding one has finished the first strain, which begins—and a coda is added to the whole.

Only in the musical drama is it possible to use speech in concert. If all talk at once in real life there is a Babel of tongues, for the accents and tones cross and re-cross one another, disguising and disfiguring each; so it would be in the spoken drama. But when words are combined with music, the accents and tones of even a large number of voices, or parts, can be so regulated and made to agree with one another that each part is distinguishable from the others, and the whole is harmonious. The voices, in fact, are in concert, or consort, with one another. Hence the old expression, consort music.

After the quartet is more dialogue, and Rocco follows with some wise sayings about the folly of marrying without money, which, as he has just given his consent to the marriage, seems rather of the nature of banter, and is rightly put into the simplest form of music—a tuneful ballad.

Dialogue follows, in which Fidelio obtains Rocco's consent to help him attend to the prisoners, and hears, for the first time, of the one prisoner who has been kept in close confinement for two years. This man she partly hopes and partly fears to be her husband, whom she is seeking; and the emotion which she shows calls forth Marcellina's sympathy, though the girl looks elsewhere for the cause of it. Out of the conversation which ensues upon this is woven a trio. This trio was, in the original form of the opera, the close of the first act, and it still seems to form a climax to what we may call the domestic part of the opera, during which we only suspect the deeper feeling that is beneath, and which comes out afterwards. The key-form of the trio is that of a sonata. The first idea—is carried out in different ways for each voice in turn, according to their different ways of looking at the same subject. Fidelio, hoping to release her husband, will bravely bear any load for so noble a prize. Rocco, thinking of the proposed marriage, commends her bravery. Marcellina, thinking of the same, sympathizes with Fidelio; but her more timid thoughts are expressed in a different melody, while the band retains the brave thought in her stead. A second idea, of hopes of happiness, with a new musical idea is also carried out differently for each voice, the three joining towards the end. This idea, beginning in F, soon goes into G, the dominant of its dominant, as is the case with many sonatas, and forms a bridge between the first and second subjects, and the latter follows, with a continuation of the same idea, in C, the dominant of F. A second part follows—full of changing thoughts in changing keys and new ideas.

Ex. 187.

Digitized by Google

Rocco's words are of the governor's permission to Fidelio to share his work, and of the comfort she, as a son-in-law, will be to his old age. Marcellina is impatient for her wedding day; and Fidelio sometimes joins the others, and sometimes sings aside with thoughts of anxiety and of hope. This section, the fantasia, comes to a half cadence in F; and, in quicker time, is followed by the final section in F, which is a parallel as to key to the recapitulation.

Ex. 188.

All three, in this part, join in eagerness to do the coming work. Rocco and Marcellina speak of the projected marriage with joy, while Fidelio thinks sadly of her own marriage day, when she gave her hand to sweetest bonds.

Pizzaro, the governor, now comes in, with soldiers, and a march is played during their entry. A letter which he reads contains the warning of the coming of a great official to inquire into the state of certain prisoners supposed to be detained there unlawfully; and Pizzaro cries out to himself that Florestan, whom he has reported dead long ago, will be discovered still in chains. Then the full tide of revengeful feelings breaks out, and speech bursts into song of the fiercest kind. He must have revenge; Florestan must die; he, who once trampled him in the dust, is now his victim, and he will kill him; and he gloats over the thought of Florestan's sufferings, crying "Triumph! triumph!" so that the soldiers in the back hear his raging and muttering, and are horrified. The music of this song (described in former pages) is in a complete sonata form. Every change of thought in the words has a corresponding change in the music; and the recoil of the thoughts in his heart brings a corresponding return of the musical ideas, though always with some change which may accord with the new use of the former thought.

OLIVERIA PRESCOTT.

PRAGUE.—The new Artists' House is to be ornamented with statues of Josquin de Pres, Orlandus Lassus, Palestrina, Ludovico Vittoria, Johann Sebastian Bach, Handel, Haydn, Gluck, Mozart, Beethoven, Weber, Franz Schubert, Cherubini, Auber, Mendelssohn, and Schumann. Sculptors have been invited to take part in a public competition for the execution of the statues.

VAUDEVILLE THEATRE.—Gammon, an adaptation by Mr James Mortimer, of La Poudre aux Yeux, by Messrs Labiche and Martin, was produced at the Vaudeville Theatre on Thursday afternoon, July 13th. Those who had the courage to attend at a casual afternoon performance did not, by any means, go unrewarded for their pains. Certain it is that a more diverting comedy is not often seen on our stage. The moral sought to be inculcated is that it is foolish, and even disastrous, to make a false appearance to the world, and to pretend to have seven thousand a year when, as a matter of fact, one has only seven hundred. The satire, as in the case of M. Sardou's Famille Benoiton, is dwelt upon with almost too much persistency; but Gammon is by no means boisterous and farcical, and claims to be a genuine comedy of manners. The scene has been transferred by the adaptor to English ground, although the complete subjection of the young people and the haggling between the two fathers as to settlements and dowries are features which rather reflect French manners than those of middle-class society in England. The characters are skilfully drawn. Mr J. F. Young thoroughly realized that of the old salesman who, at the instigation of his wife, temporarily departs from his ordinary plain and honest way of life. No less successful in his way was Mr Edward Price, as Uncle Streaky, a bluff and honest old cattle farmer. In the end, Uncle Streaky acts as the good fairy of the piece, and brings the husbands, if not the wives, to a sense of the absurdity of blowing themselves out, as he puts it, like the frog in the fable who attempts to rival the ox. Mr W. Lestocq contributed a characteristically broad sketch of the sham footman; and Miss Lydia Cowell's acting, as a servant girl, was quaint and truthful. Mrs Leigh and Mrs W. Sidney did not miss any of the effect to be got out of the foibles of the two scheming mothers. The comedy was received with loud laughter and applause throughout, and Mr Mortimer was called before the curtain.—M. T.

THE STAGE OF THE RESTORATION.

It is one of the wisest of Lord Beaconsfield's many wise sayings that England is governed by reaction. It was made prominently emphatic in its truth towards the latter portion of his life, when an ungrateful country repaid his years of patience, prudence, and courage by going over to his political antagonists, and allowing them to undo the result of his untiring energy and able statesmanship. But there is no greater manifestation of the philosophy of the axiom than is found in the condition of England before and after the return of the Stuarts to the throne of Great Britain. Not only had the Theatres been dismantled by the Puritans, the persecuted actors being whipped at the cart's tail, but public amusements generally had been abolished. Bear-baiting was forbidden, not from pity for the bears, for they slaughtered them, but from a sour vexation at people enjoying it; Maypoles were cut down, village festivals prohibited; horse-racing and betting were discountenanced, as were even rope-dancing and wrestling. The intolerant bigots, in a word, had but one aim, and that was to make their tyranny as unbearable as possible, and to render life miserable for their unhappy victims. With the return of Charles the Second all this was changed; men sought delight in frivolous occupations and in pleasures still more reprehensible; neither authority nor personal propriety hindered a nation, weary of the years of cant and hypocrisy, from rushing into the very vortex of profligacy, in which the ostentation of vice took the place of the deceit that had previously veiled it. The florid and eloquent pages of Lord Macaulay unfold the gay and guilty panorama of the days of the "Merry Monarch." All light literature was tainted by the licentiousness of the times, and if satire and poetry were used to undermine innocence and to aid and advocate vice, we cannot wonder that, with the patronage of a dissolute king and dissolute nobles, the Stage became what it did under an influence that permeated Court and city, and in its reflections of the times forgot to censure the corruption that it mirrored. To read the plays of that era, and of the years that followed it, is but to consider history in a dramatic form. Genial, kind Charles Lamb may speak of the characters of the comedies of Congreve and Wycherley as inhabitants of an imaginary land, "the Utopia of gallantry, where pleasure is duty, and the manners perfect freedom"; but, although this might be the aspect under which they appeared to him, it is impossible to shut one's eyes to the actual existence of people who lived while Dryden wrote, by whom he was inspired when he penned his prologues and epilogues, and to whose taste he appealed in many of his comedies.

Intrigue was as much the business of the spectators of a comedy as it was of the characters in the play, and of the actors and actresses who impersonated them. Pepys' diary is interspersed, not only with the doings of the Stage, but with the doings of the actresses, which have mostly the business of gallantry to increase their interest. Thus, in 1668, he went to the play, as he tells us, when Mrs Knipp, one of the actresses, came to sit by him, and the talk was of the King's love for Miss Davis, an actress, and of the valuable ring that his Majesty had given to her—Mrs Knipp also telling the Admiralty Secretary "that the King did send several times for Nelly," much to the sorrow of the diarist, who fears the Prince is too much devoted to his pleasure, forgetting how frequently Mrs Knipp's name appears in his own pages. Indeed, the gallantries of the King and his brother were carried on without concealment. The Queen complained to Lady Castlemaine that his Majesty took cold by staying so late at the latter's house, upon which Lady Castlemaine replied that he must go somewhere else, as he left her betimes. The King, who had come soon enough to overhear this, ordered the "bold, impertinent woman" to leave the Court, but all was made up between them in two or three days. Surely the comedies that Lamb looked upon as the Utopia of gallantry, where pleasure is duty, were rather founded upon the actual life of the Royal libertine and his courtiers, and reflected a society which defied propriety, and took for its heroes and heroines the Rochesters and Sedleys of the time. We know that an absurd delusion of King Charles's chaplain, Dr Pilling, was used by Dr Dryden in his comedy, The Wild Gallant. Indeed, the comedies of Dryden, Etherege, Mrs Behn, Shadwell, or, we might say, of nearly all the dramatists of the time, treat of the infidelity of wives, and derive their fun from the ridicule with which they associate the husbands, The Woman Captain, by Shadwell, being instanced as an average specimen of the Restoration comedies. The manner in which Gripe, the usurer, is fooled by his wife and Sir Humphrey Scattergood, one of those profligate heroes that we find as a matter of course in all comic plays of the period, was, doubtless, most entertaining to the audience, and showed the spirit of the age. It must have been so amusing to see the dishonoured husband forced by his wife, who was disguised as an officer in the army, to enlist with his man Richard, both master and servant being caned by the fascinating lady for going through their drill awkwardly. The conclusion of the play is quite in harmony with what has gone before. Mrs Gripe compels her husband to separate, he giving her an allowance; Sir Humphrey marries a former mistress, having ruined himself by his extravagance; and there is as little moral to be found as in The Beggar's Opera, after it had been altered by "The Player." It is to be noted, too, the matter-of-course way in which courtesans are married off at the end of the comedies, in which they have been leading such irregular lives, until the last act, or probably the last scene, has warned them to accept some rich noodle for a husband.

The political comedies that espoused the views of the Court, such as Sir Barnaby Whig; or, No Wit like a Woman's, form another phase of the Stage reflections of the Restoration. D'Urfey was every bit as loyal as his fellows, and in his comedy showed Sir Barnaby as contemptible as the most zealous Cavalier could desire. He is made to sing a song against the Roundheads, to become a Roman Catholic, then to turn Mahommedan, and, finally, gets sent to Newgate. Whigs and husbands, in fact, had a bad time of it under the reign of the Merry Monarch. In Mrs Behn's City Heiress, a comedy of Charles Lamb's true Utopian type, Sir Charles Meriwell says: "Damn the City," to which his uncle, Sir Anthony, rejoins, "All the Whigs, Charles, all the Whigs." Venice Preserved was also an attack on the Whigs, the Earl of Shaftesbury being satirized under the name of Antonio.

But there is no more marked reflection of the age than is to be found in the falseness and hollow character of the Stage of Charles the Second's reign. The heroics are exaggerations; nobility of conduct, emotion, and sentiment are all make believes and shams; the men who wrote, the audience who listened, were alike without the inspiration of genuine feeling and true patriotism. This to a great extent accounts for the inflated nonsense of many of the tragedies of the time. There was no spirit of national independence and national freedom in the nation; how could it be found upon the stage? It was not alone that, to a King who was subsidized by a French Monarch, and influenced by a French courtesan, the utterances of enthusiastic patriotic sentiments would be unpalatable, but to the nation at large they would be but little interesting. Cromwell had gone in for making England feared and respected abroad, but he had been so strict a tyrant at home that to a great extent the people were glad enough to get Prince Log in the place of Prince Stork. The recollection of the Dutch war, with the fleet from Holland invading the Thames, insulting Tilbury Fort, and making the English tremble for the fate of the Tower, was not likely to inspire people with the fervour that Shakspere could feel under a Queen without fear when her country was threatened by the immense armament of the most powerful Empire in the world. English politicians who were in the opposition might incite the people to indignation at the disgrace to the honour of their country caused by timid and corrupt rulers, but national feeling had been as much trampled out of Britons by the home tyranny of the Puritans as it was allowed to slumber under the lascivious langour of the profligate Stuart. The impoverished courtiers condescended to associate at times with the wives and daughters of the merchants and traders of the City, and it would be as well not to investigate too closely the relations of Court and Town; but to an extent it is probable that the opinions of the citizens would be influenced by those of their aristocratic acquaintances. It must also be remembered that many of the dramatic authors of the Restoration were noblemen whose lives were little better than those led by their histrionic heroes. As Dr Doran says, the Duke of Buckingham was a man of great wit and no virtue; from the year of his birth to that of his death history had nothing to record but crimes and meanness. Rochester was no better than the author of The Rehearsal, which burlesque might have as fairly satirized the bombast of Lord Orrery as it did that of Dryden, Davenant, or Howard. With such a class of authors it may be suggested that the nature which they made the stage reflect was their own, and it is as well to take into account the very artificial life of the influential portion of a theatrical audience, of which the wearing of vizards by the ladies is not the least noteworthy. Such stage reflections were only class ones.

ROME.—The Municipal Council of Rome have granted a site for the erection of a new theatre, to be called the Teatro della Commedia.—The Musical Society recently gave a highly successful performance of Weber's Oberon.

MILAN.—Thanks to the exertions of the St Cecilia Society, a School of Sacred Music has been established here. Pupils will be admitted from the age of nine. Besides religious and æsthetic instruction, the programme will include the history of sacred music, Latin, and music from the first elements up to composition.

COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS.—At the Midsummer examinations the examiners were Drs G. B. Arnold and F. E. Gladstone, Messrs J. Higgs, E. J. Hopkins, and E. H. Turpin. Diplomas of Associateship were awarded to Miss Brickwell, Messrs W. E. Bartlett, W. Duncan, J. Lively Gregory, G. J. Halford, F. J. Harper, H. Riding, C. Rowland, and Booth Sharpe; Fellowships, Messrs J. Acton, R. J. Hopper, and W. Mullineux. At the annual meeting of members on Tuesday, July 11, E. J. Hopkins in the chair, the reports, artistic and financial, were alike satisfactory. Drs G. B. Arnold, Bridge, C. J. Frost, F. E. Gladstone, A. H. Mann, and Verrinder, Messrs C. Bridge, H. F. Frost, J. Higgs, E. J. Hopkins, W. S. Hoyte, C. Warwick Jordan, H. Walmsley Little, A. J. Page, C. W. Pearce, C. E. Stephens, F. J. Sawyer, H. Trego, James Turpin, W. H. Wale, and T. Wingham were appointed councillors for the coming year. Votes of thanks were passed to the hon. secretary, E. H. Turpin; the hon. treasurer, M. E. Wesley; the auditors, Messrs Hainworth and Webster; and the chairman. At the close of the business, Mr T. L. Southgate lucidly explained, and practically illustrated, Föhr's music electrograph. The ingenious mechanism and working of this attachment, by which extemporaneous and other performances (J. C. Ward, C. E. Stephens, &c.), were accurately registered, excited the warm interest of a large and critical audience. The instrument may be seen at Mr J. Wallis's, 135, Euston Road.

BERLIN.—The Royal Operahouse will remain closed till the 1st September, when it is hoped the precautionary measures projected for the safety of the public against fire may be completed.—Raimondin, by Herr von Perfall, the first novelty of the season, will be followed by a new three-act romantic opera, Gudrun, book by C. Niemann, music by Aug. Klughardt.—Mdme Naumann-Gungl has concluded her engagement at Kroll's, after appearing with much success as Fidelio.—At the same theatre, Mdme Basta, from Munich, has appeared as Gilda, in Rigoletto.—Mdlle Gusti Galster, new to the stage, has made a favourable impression as Violetta, in Der lustige Krieg, at the Friedrich-Wilhelmstädtisches Theater.

ALIDUKE OF THE STRAIGHT MARCHES.—Cert'nly. Nevertheless, Sir Percival (Wagner's "Parsifal"), at request of "a maide that was come of high bloode (and shee was dombe and had never spoken word"), was knighted by King Arthur, in Camelot. Whereat the "dumbe maide spake," departed from the court, "asked a priest," was "confessed and houseled," and straightway died. "Sir Aliduke of the Straight Marches" is tolerably conversant with some shreds of the matter he propounds, but would do well to seek the fountain head.

A LETTER FROM WAGNER.

THE last number of the Bayreuther Blätter contains a letter addressed by Richard Wagner to Herr Friedrich Schön, of Worms, one of the leading promoters of the Bayreuth enterprise. In the beginning of the letter, Wagner speaks regretfully of the failure of his scheme to establish a School of Music in Bayreuth, but states, at the same time, that, even if the large funds necessary for carrying it out were now placed at his disposal, he would not enter on such an undertaking. He makes the following observations on the subject:—

"I no longer believe in our music, avoiding it on principle whenever it meets me, and, if the prophecy of our friend, Count Gobineau, that in ten years all Europe will be overrun by Asiatic hordes and our entire civilization and culture be destroyed, comes true, I should not even blink, as I must assume that under the circumstances, and above all things, our musical system would be ruined."

In another place, he says, referring to the fact that his project for a Royal School of Music in Munich came to nothing:

"This proves to me that people did not consider I was adapted for the task, and really I believe they are right. I am not a musician, and feel this doubly when a celebrated composition by one or other of our most esteemed masters is played, and I am unable to perceive the music in it. We have evidently here to do with a defect under which I labour, and which renders me incapable of participating in the progress of our art."

He would willingly undertake the office of a "Beethoven-Conservator," though even in doing so he should be apprehensive of the result.

"As to the posterity of the folk-migration, only a few tragedies of Sophocles and Æschylus, but most of those of Euripides, were preserved, so to our posterity might remain some nine symphonies by Brahms, and two at most by Beethoven, copyists always following on the heels of progress."

Brahms may at any rate feel thankful for the flattering comparison. The letter, written with the usual self-assertiveness, but in a tolerably moderate tone, speaks of a plan for enabling poor musicians, by means of scholarships, to travel gratuitously, and live at Bayreuth free of expense while attending the later Parsifal performances. Such a system would "be something above awkward travelling scholarships for enabling prize-crowned students to pursue their studies in Paris and London!"

The letter goes on to speak against the modern "creation" of parts. The process of creation, we are told, is too frequently carried on behind the author's back, and, therefore, a many-membered body of artists is preferable, "despite the moral confusion of rivalities" (a gentle allusion to that faithless pair, Herr and Mdme Vogl). In conclusion, Wagner expresses gratitude to his high patron, the King of Bavaria, who, "in order to keep the Stage-Consecrative-Festival-play free from any possible disturbing influences, magnanimously renounced the wish to see it repeated in his own Theatre Royal." According to this, Parsifal can only be seen and heard at Bayreuth—an assurance, by the way, frequently given with reference to the Nibelungen series, previous to its first performance in the same town.

The name of Mr Augustus Harris's new piece to be produced at Drury Lane Theatre on Saturday, August 5, is Pluck (A Story of £50,000).

Dr Josiah Pittman is going to Lisbon next week, on a visit to a professional friend. He has declined an invitation to spend a week with Arabi Pasha at that General's stronghold between Alexandria and Cairo, though he would be made noble if he accepted, under the style of Pittman Pasha.

Mdme Adelina Patti leaves London for Paris to-morrow. The rest of her leisure time, previous to her departure for America, will be passed at Craig-y-Nos Castle, which is being strongly fortified during her temporary absence.

CONCERTS.

Kensington School of Music.—The School of Music established about three years ago in Cromwell Road has become an institution of importance, and, at the present moment, has upon its books a considerable number of amateur and professional students. The system of instruction is similar in form and direction to that of the Royal Academy of Music, a large professional body being at hand to superintend the several departments incident to a high-class curriculum of study, the Principal being Mr William Buels (founder of the Kensington Orchestral and Choral Society, with which the "School" may be said to be affiliated), to whose energetic and intelligent administration it owes its present large and widely extending prosperity. On Wednesday evening last invitations were given to listen, at the new Kensington Town Hall, to the progress that had been made by the most advanced members of the "School," and numerous examples were afforded of the proficiency achieved by the young ladies and gentlemen, who, as vocalists, pianists, violinists, and violoncellists, submitted their individual attainments to the judgment—could it be otherwise?—of a very friendly audience. Upon the various performances it is not necessary to dilate, but, making all allowances, enough was shown that the teaching was good and the promise of useful results abundant.—H.

Miss Louise Thompson's concert took place, under distinguished patronage, at the Grosvenor Hall, Belgravia, on Wednesday, July 5th. Miss Thompson has a voice of pure quality in the upper register, and of wide compass. Her vocalization has much grace of style, especially in sparkling melody, such as "La Zingara" (Donizetti), "L'Air de la lettre" (Grisar), and the lighter ballad music, of which "Coming thro' the rye" is an example. Of this the bénéficiaire gave proof by singing each of the airs so effectually as to elicit the warmest applause. Miss Thompson was fortunate in the co-operation of Fräulein Marianne Eissler, Fraülein Emmy Eissler, and the Misses Allitsen, the first two of whom had played at Sir Julius Benedict's concert prior to appearing at the Grosvenor Hall. As a violinist, Fraülein M. Eissler shows both finish and breadth of style, her rendering of an "air varié" (Vieuxtemps) winning general applause. Fraülein E. Eissler manifests almost masculine power on the piano. With these qualities she also possesses a congenial delicacy of touch when requisite. Miss Emma Allitsen, in "When the tide comes in," proved that she has a fine contralto voice, combined with execution, and, in conjunction with her sister, some duets were given, notably "Vieni la barca è pronta" (Goldberg), a melodious piece of a graceful character. Signor Monari Rocca, in "Non più andrai" and Tosti's "Good bye," exhibited his usual breadth, fire, and power.—M. P.

My horse seems to go round and round like a circus horse. Is he anti-Wagnerite, or has Lyall been chaffing?—Happy thought!—dine with a farmer; he'll tell me the nearest way. Burton and Burnaby sure to be there. They know all the farmers about, and dine with them continually. Besides (happy thought) where Cap'n Burton is, Burton ale (Burton old ale) may be reckoned on. The most he could see
Was a wave of the sea,
A boat, man and boy, line and

DRAMATIC MUSIC AT OUR ROYAL ACADEMY.

Sir,—I read the subjoined in the musical column of the Daily News (Monday, 17th inst.):—

"The Royal Academy of Music gave a performance of Mozart's Così fan tutte on Saturday evening, when some of the students of the operatic class afforded proofs of the progress made in dramatic singing under the wise course of tuition pursued at the institution. This is a feature that cannot fail to be of valuable use in the preparation of pupils for the requirements of the stage—elocution and action being too often ignored in exclusive attention to vocal training. Misses M. Cockburn and K. Hardy, and Mrs. J. Wade, respectively as Fiordiligi, Despina, and Dorabella; Mr R. H. Cummings as Don Alfonso; and Messrs H. B. Fulkerson and A. T. Jarratt as the two young officers, Ferrando and Guglielmo, manifested, in their respective degrees, good capacities for an operatic stage career. Mr G. Garcia, as dramatic director, Mr Fiori, as musical director, and A. Izard, as pianoforte accompanist, gave valuable co-operation."

If your excellent contemporary were a quarter of a century older, he might remember that this is no new step on the part of the Royal Academy of Music, and that some twice that period ago it already constituted an important feature. Two of the most agreeable "soprano" voices were those of Sterndale Bennett and W. Lovell Phillips, both of whom took parts in the Nozze di Figaro and other works by the same Mozart. I am, Sir, yours,

A Connoisseur of Some Decades.

THE "HARMONY."

Matilda Jane, I've been and seen
A work to turn your head—
A rhapsody in blue and green,
And yellow, black, and red;
My friends will simply go insane,
For envy's force is strong;
I've bought the work, Matilda Jane,
And here it comes along.

A frightful sum I've given for
The work that meets your eye;
I've bought it at the Grosvenor,
Where Wealth alone may buy.
Matilda Jane, that canvas speaks,
It shouts from ev'ry line, [weeks
A man could gaze for weeks and Upon that great design.

Now bring the steps, Matilda; fly
Within our banquet hall,
And hang this great production high
Upon its fairest wall,
That all may see the charms that lurk
Within its peerless——stop,
Is this the bottom of the work,
Or can it be the top?

Your explanation's nobly meant,
But foolish, to a word;
Your reading of the work's intent
Is hopelessly absurd!
It regularly shocks me that Such schism should prevail—
This yellow patch is not a cat,
Nor is the green its tail.

Attend, Matilda; hear how I
Beneath its surface dip:—
The yellow is the sunset sky,
The green's a plunging ship;
The red's—the red's—I'm mostly
To hit upon and trace [quick
The mean—the red's a candlestick—
No, that were out of place.

Why—there—with reason I've relied Upon my deep resource—
Why, this that we supposed the side—
Yes, that's the top, of course!
We follow this unfailing plan,
And we at once disclose
The portrait of a gentleman—
Of course—why, here's his nose!

And yet it isn't wholly clear
In certain places now—
For what's the comet doing here?—
And isn't this a cow?
I rather think the puzzle's roots
Too deeply hidden lie;
I fail to grasp that pair of boots
That decks the distant sky!

It's wrong side out! Matilda, blush!
What foolishness! Alack!
The cleanings of the artist's brush—
He's daubed 'em on the back!
Ah, here's the front; now try again,
Our pains were misapplied—
This isn't half so nice and plain—
I like the other side.

Fun.

Frankfort-on-the-Maine.—Among Joachim Raff's papers there have been found a completed symphony, Im Herbst; one not quite completed, Im Winter; a secular oratorio, Dornröschen, book by W. Genast; and two operas for which the composer himself wrote the librettos.

GOUNOD'S REDEMPTION.

Three times upon the MS. of his oratorio, Redemption, has M. Gounod written opus vitæ meæ, in emphatic expression of an opinion which English connoisseurs will be asked to confirm or reject at the forthcoming Birmingham Festival. The verdict of an author upon his own productions is not always trustworthy. Many a conspicuous example in literature and art shows that the public voice sometimes puts it aside, and pronounces final judgment in a very different sense. It may be so here, but the question is not one for present consideration. Whether Redemption will rank as the work of M. Gounod's life, or take a lower place, this is certain—the composer's recorded opinion implies the earnest endeavour of an accomplished master, and demands for his oratorio most respectful consideration. Other circumstances strengthen the claims thus advanced. Redemption has not been written hurriedly to order. More than ten years ago, and, we believe, while M. Gounod was a resident amongst us, the idea of composing a great sacred work fixed itself in his mind, and bore immediate fruit. Considerable portions of Redemption were actually written in London, and from that time till a few months ago, the task of completing it engaged M. Gounod's serious attention. In this respect we find a parallel of happy omen between the circumstances of the oratorio and of Faust. The famous and immortal opera was a thing of slow growth. We have the master's own authority for stating that he was inspired by Goethe's drama while yet a student at Rome as holder of the Grand Prix; and that some of the most beautiful and important passages in the opera grew out of his reading of the German poem, long before a French libretto had been prepared. If it took years to perfect Faust, with the result we all know, the fact that Redemption was in hand for a decade has a significance that should at any rate magnify the interest with which its performance is anticipated. Nor will English amateurs think less of the work for the reason there is to believe that we may regard it as a result of M. Gounod's sojourn in this oratorio-loving land. The composer, no doubt, had in view an English triumph for Redemption. When invited to write for the Glasgow Musical Festival five or six years ago, it was to his oratorio that he turned, and, but for the failure of the negotiations on other grounds, Birmingham would have been anticipated by the commercial capital of Scotland. But in the Midlands or in North Britain matters not; the English destiny of Redemption is certain of fulfilment. Let us add that our country deserves whatever good may accrue from the possession of M. Gounod's magnum opus, since the Birmingham Festival Committee and Messrs Novello, Ewer, and Co. combined to purchase it at a price impossible even of conception elsewhere. The composer long ago avowed a grievance against England, but he now, perhaps, thinks better of the perfidious island, and rejoices in the £4,000 with which the committee and the publishers bought his oratorio, neither having previously seen or heard a note of it. The figure is magnificent—worthy of the country which a French writer has called "the California of artists;" but even more satisfactory to the composer, if not to the man of business, must have been the faith which invested so much money without sight.

There are obvious reasons why we should not now write analytically and critically of the Redemption In the first place a work of this kind cannot be judged from a pianoforte score, nor would it be altogether safe to do so from a full score, having regard to certain peculiarities the effect of which a performance can alone reveal. In the next place, we have no desire to anticipate what may be said in a more timely and confident fashion later on. There is, however, no reason why the scope and character of the work should not be indicated in general terms, and without prejudice to any interest concerned.

Redemption is divided into three parts, with a prologue, and its structure is essentially that of a German "Passions-Musik," the story being told in narrative form, interspersed with reflections, principally choral. The choice of this method by M. Gounod—who is the author of the words as well as of the music—will not be impugned. Not only has it the sanction of such high authorities as Bach and Handel, but it is exacted by the reverence which shrinks from giving a purely dramatic version of the most solemn events in Christian history. Between the old German form and that of M. Gounod there are, however, important differences in detail. The first confined its musical interest almost exclusively to the reflective airs and choruses, and to such portions of the narrative text as demanded lyrical or dramatic treatment, whereas the French composer lavishes upon the historic record all the wealth that a modern orchestra places at his disposal, thus raising it from being a mere thread of connection to the highest pitch of artistic and religious significance. Moreover, the orchestra plays an independent part in the scheme of the work, having entrusted to it the sole expression of certain incidents, such as the darkness that signalized the Crucifixion and the prayer of the Apostles on the Day of Pentecost. It may be added, as indicating another point of divergence from the German form, that there are two narrators—tenor and bass—who relieve each other in enunciating the text, and, occasionally, join their voices. M. Gounod, on the other hand, follows his illustrious predecessors in giving the words of Christ to a separate part, which stands alone in solemn and dignified isolation, and he frankly adopts the Passions-Musik choral, making it an important feature of his work. Turning to the "argument," we find that nothing can rightly be called superfluous, albeit the prologue opens with a short orchestral movement, entitled "Creation." It was necessary to show the need for redemption, and this is done by briefly referring to the Fall, and to the promise of a Saviour in the fullness of time. The first part takes up the personal narrative of Christ at the point when He is condemned; accompanies the Sufferer to Calvary, and follows all the incidents of the Crucifixion down to the exclamation of the Centurion: "This man was in truth the Son of God." Passing over the Entombment and Resurrection, the second part opens with the visit of the Holy Women to the empty Sepulchre, followed by the appearance to them of the risen Lord, the suborning of the Roman watch by the Sanhedrim, the announcement by the Women to the Apostles of what they had seen, the apparition of Christ to His doubting followers, and the Ascension into Heaven. The third part logically rounds off the argument with the events of Pentecost—the prayer of the Apostles, the descent of the Holy Ghost, and the preaching of the perfected Gospel. From this mere outline it appears that the sequence of events is neither redundant nor wanting fullness. The Fall, the Promise, the Expiation, the Resurrection, the Ascension, and the gift of a Divine Comforter and Guide mark all the links in the great chain with which M. Gounod set himself to deal. With regard to the music, we can now only testify to its serious spirit and lofty purpose. Whether M. Gounod has been equal to or fallen short of his stupendous theme is a matter for future consideration, but that he approached it and handled it in the true spirit of an artist does not admit a moment's doubt. The music makes no concessions to anything or anybody, but with laudable strictness addresses itself to the subject, and leaves the rest to fate. This is the course that often ensures success, and always deserves it. At present, a knowledge that it is M. Gounod's course will intensify the respect and sympathy with which our musical public are prepared to receive that which he has called "Opus vitæ meæ."—D. T.

MUSIC AT BOULOGNE-SUR-MER.

Faust, Galathée, Lucie, Haydée, Si j'étais Roi, La Fille du Tambour Major, Le Postillon de Lonjumeau, and La Favorita have been represented since last I wrote. The audiences on each occasion appreciated the talent displayed by the artists of M. Bérard's troupe. In Faust, Mdlle Levasseur's impersonation of Marguerite left little to be desired. Mdlle Francini as Sybil, and M. Degrave as Mephistofeles were excellent. The fêtes have brought a great concourse of bands, and we have been "over-fêted," particularly by the constant performance of Rouget de Lille's "National Hymn." From early in the morning till late at night, the din of "fanfares" and drums has kept awake the would-be peaceful and slumbering inhabitants of the town. Enfin, the fête in memory of the taking of the Bastille is over, to the general satisfaction.

MR ROSSETTI'S PICTURES.

We are able to announce that arrangements will be made for a complete, or, at least, in every sense representative, exhibition of Mr Dante Gabriel Rossetti's works, although the place and the date have not yet been finally determined upon. When the event takes place the public will, for the first time, be able to form an opinion of the work of an artist of whom most of them cannot possibly know much more than the name. The reputation of Mr Rossetti as a painter is without precedent in the history of art. So far from courting publicity, he carefully avoided it. In spite of many offers from official and unofficial quarters he refused to send his pictures to an exhibition. The walls of the Royal Academy knew him not, neither did those of the Grosvenor Gallery. He once or twice thought of doing himself what is now being done after his death—that is, bringing together a collection of his most important works and exhibiting them; but the worry and correspondence and attention to business matters which such an undertaking would have implied always nipped such schemes in the bud. Thus it came to pass that his pictures remained unknown to the public at large. They found few admirers, but they found buyers. Ever since Mr Ruskin "discovered" the young artist, Mr Rossetti's work was eagerly sought after in a small but select circle of connoisseurs. Pencil sketch, or water-colour drawing, or oil-painting never remained long in the studio as soon as the artist agreed to part with them, and the prices he realized for designs of a severely ideal class were such as might have roused the envy of many a popular painter intent upon supplying the popular taste of the day. Mr Rossetti, it is true, might have been a richer man if he had agreed to paint and exhibit portraits of fashionable ladies in interesting attitudes; but this he steadfastly refused to do; the few and excellent likenesses—mostly coloured chalk-drawings—which remain from his hand were mostly those of friends, undertaken as a favour rather than for the sake of money. Mr Rossetti was equally averse to the other channels through which fame and wealth usually come to the artist. It was only in his latter years that he was persuaded to allow some of his designs to be reproduced by means of photography, and the statement that he at first became known to the public as a "high-class" book illustrator is a pure myth. The only book he ever illustrated was his sister Miss Christine Rossetti's "Goblin Market," in addition to which he did one design for his friend, Mr Allingham's "Day and Night Songs," one for his sister's "The Prince's Progress," and three or four for Moxon's edition of Tennyson's poems.

But the fame which Mr Rossetti refrained from courting came to him unasked for in various ways. Those who had an opportunity of seeing his principal pictures in the collections of Mr Leyland, Mr Graham, late M.P. for Glasgow, Lord Mount-Temple, Mr Leathart, of Newcastle, Mr Turner, Mr Rae, Mr Joinder, and others, were too deeply impressed with their beauty to keep silence on the subject. Others as strongly opposed a style of art which to them appeared a silent protest against all that correctly-minded persons were expected to admire. As is usual in such cases, enthusiastic worshippers and violent detractors worked hand in hand. Perhaps nothing contributed as much to the reputation of the pre-Raphaelites as the clever caricatures published many years ago in Punch, and accompanied by an equally clever poem, from which we can call to mind only the two following lines descriptive of the type of female beauty affected by the brotherhood:—

> "How all their pretty lips do pout,
> How very much their chins stick out!"

In addition to his detractors and admirers, Mr Rossetti's imitators should be mentioned among those who have indirectly spread his fame far and wide. It is, perhaps, unjust to speak of imitation in the case of so great and so original an artist as Mr Burne Jones. At the same time it is undeniable, and no one would be more ready to acknowledge it than Mr Jones himself, that he received his first impulse from Mr Rossetti's work, much as he has since developed and expanded that impulse. Other artists less gifted have drunk more freely at the same source, and the few familiar with that source often were able to trace pictorial motives and pictorial mannerisms, boldly displayed on the walls of certain exhibitions, to their common origin. It thus happened—for the public were vaguely aware of the fact—that Mr Rossetti was charged with the eccentricities and affectations in which his self-created disciples indulged, and that his name was indentified with a movement about which he knew little and cared less. In such circumstances it may be safely predicted that when his works are exhibited they will create a profound impression, and give rise to comments of the most divergent kind. We do not wish to influence that impression or to anticipate those comments. Neither is it our present purpose to give a catalogue raisonné, or even a list of Mr Rossetti's most important pictures. All we propose to do is to divest the subject of some of the misconceptions which, through being repeated again and again, have gained general currency, and by that means to establish a basis on which the artist's work may be judged without ill-will or favour.

Most of these misconceptions have sprung from Mr Rossetti's early connection with the so-called pre-Raphaelite movement. The aim and origin of that movement have been too frequently identified with its misleading title. The great Italian painters, who lived before Raphael, gave to it little more than the name. This is sufficiently clear from the composition of the "brotherhood," which consisted of seven members. Of these, only four—Mr Holman Hunt, Mr Millais, Mr Collinson, and Mr Rossetti—made their mark as painters. Mr F. G. Stephens soon relinquished the brush for the pen. Mr W. M. Rossetti, the editor and biographer of Shelley, was the literary champion of the movement. Mr Woolner was a sculptor whose "elective affinity" with Giotto and Fra Angelico could only be of the most distant nature. But even the four painters had, in reality, little in common with the trecentisti and quattrocentisti as regarded either subject matter or treatment. They knew little of the naïve religious feeling and the horror of sensuous beauty which inspired the works of Cornelius, Steinle, and other German mediævalists. All they learnt from their early models was the absolute adherence to nature and truth, regardless of the academic or classical canons of beauty and propriety. The principle of truth at any price, in opposition to academic conventionalism, was, indeed, the real connecting link among artists very different in their individual tastes and capacities. Like Schumann, when he founded a similar society for the revival of music, they might have said, "If academies with dunces at their heads designate their members, why should not we, the younger generation, nominate ourselves," and so they founded the "brotherhood" and half-playfully added the initials P.R.B. to their names. That the principle of truth, and nothing but truth, in many instances led to very eccentric results may be seen in the early drawings of the pre-Raphaelites, and in that most curious of short-lived periodicals, the Germ, their literary organ, much coveted by modern book-hunters. The artists accordingly, as their experience grew, relaxed the severity of their doctrine, with the exception, perhaps, of Mr Holman Hunt, who has remained an uncompromising realist through all the changes of time and taste. Mr Millais, on the other hand, soon entered the fold of the much-maligned academy, and Mr Rossetti, from a painter of character, became a painter of beauty. This fundamental change will immediately strike the observant visitor of the proposed exhibition, provided it comprises the early sketches as well as the finished pictures of later years. Among these early drawings—sometimes slight sketches in pen and ink—there are specimens of singular dramatic force. The subjects are frequently taken from the Arthurian legends and from Shakspere. Of the death of Lady Macbeth many versions belonging to various periods and in various stages of completion are in existence, one more powerful than the other. The subject was a favourite with the artist. He took it up again and again, and intended to the last to develop it into a finished picture, unconscious, perhaps, of the change which had come over the spirit of his genius. Equally impressive is his conception of the German idea of the Doppelgänger in an amplified form—two lovers walking in a wood and meeting with their own wraiths. Subjects of modern tragedy also were in those days affected by Mr Rossetti and the pre-Raphaelites generally (for instance, Mr Holman Hunt's terrible "The Awakened Conscience"). For years and years he was occupied with a picture (also left unfinished) in which a countryman going to market early in the morning meets on Blackfriars Bridge his long-lost sweetheart in a state of degradation worse than death.

That the early promise of dramatic power remained unfulfilled by the work of Mr Rossetti's best period it would be vain to deny. In the same measure as his sense of form developed, as his colours gained almost Venetian glow and harmony, so his subjects became more and more symbolical, losing in human interest what they gained in abstract beauty. From a psychological point of view the growing influence of Dante, and especially of the Vita Nuova—for the Divina Commedia appealed comparatively little to him in a pictorial sense—may partly account for the change. But at the same time it is likely enough that in his more limited sphere Mr Rossetti reached a degree of perfection which elsewhere might have been denied him. It has been said that he was a colourist rather than a draughtsman, and this is true in the sense that his more elaborate designs never show the instinct of outline and the firmness of hand characteristic of the French and German schools. At the same time his drawing of draperies and poses was most careful, not to say scientific. Mr Rossetti did not affect the nude, and, with the exception of a Venus Verticordia and a Venus Astarte in the possession of Mr Fry, there is not in his more important pictures a single undraped figure. But in order to gain a natural and beautiful fall of garments, he would frequently draw in the naked limbs from life and clothe them afterwards, the drapery also being placed on the living model; for lay-figures he used as little as possible. We believe that among living painters Mr Rossetti has realized the highest type of female beauty. There is in his single figures — Sibylla, Palmifera, Silence, "The Blessed Damozel," Proserpine, "with eyes fixed ever in vain on the pitiless eyes of Fate," or whatever else they may be called—an intensity of expression and a depth of pathos which speaks to the heart as well as to the eye. It may be said that the type of beauty once attained by the artist was little varied by him. We have again and again the same deep-gray eyes, the same wavy masses of hair in different shades of brown and auburn, the same fully-developed mouth. But it is difficult to quarrel with an artist for giving us too much of one thing if that one is so exquisite. The masterpiece of Mr Rossetti's latter years is beyond a doubt his "Dante's Dream," recently bought by the Corporation of Liverpool. It is drawn, to use the artist's own words, "from the Vita Nuova of Dante, and embodies his dream on the day of the death of Beatrice Portinari, in which he is led by Love himself to the bedside of his dear lady, and sees other ladies covering her with a veil as she lies in death. The scene is a chamber of dreams, where Beatrice is seen lying on a couch recessed in the wall as if just fallen back in death." The beauty of this large and elaborate composition, the grief in Dante's face, the loveliness of the dead Beatrice, the glow of colour, the significance of the accessories, it would be impossible to describe. One of the most remarkable features is the distinct Italian atmosphere which strikes the observer of this and other pictures of the Dante cycle—all the more remarkable if we bear in mind that Mr Rossetti never visited Italy. An avenue of trees seen through a window of Beatrice's chamber was in reality suggested by the noble line of elms which shaded Cheyne Walk, Chelsea, before the Embankment was made.—Times.

Recent Organ Appointments.—The recent changes regarding certain organ appointments of importance, as notified in the selection of Mr Walter Parratt as successor to Sir G. J. Elvey, St. George's Chapel, Windsor, Mr C. H. Lloyd as the organist following Dr Corfe, at Christ Church, Oxford, and Mr T. L. Williams as successor to Mr Lloyd at the Cathedral, Gloucester, will, perhaps not unnaturally, call attention to the general question of the selection of organists, as well as command the cordial approval of all interested in the musical interests of the Church; for the gentlemen just named are acknowledged to be highly gifted and thoroughly trained artists. To some, the idea of selecting organists through the moving springs of what is called "influence" seems at first sight less acceptable than the now less common process of a playing competition. It is well, perhaps, to remind such persons that the very acquirement of influence shows in itself something of the building up of a high character and reputation. Again, the selection of a man with an achieved position is as a rule, a wiser, calmer proceeding than the choice of an organist from a group of players, more or less affected by nervousness, and playing possibly under novel and disadvantageous conditions. Of course, the open competition may, and very likely will, in most cases reveal the best performer; still, in the disposal of important places, the selection is naturally, or certainly should be, limited to men of unexceptional merit and position, who for the most part would decline to place their names on a list of competing candidates. The choice of the different organists for high places of late years has been very satisfactorily managed, a proof that our cathedral and other responsible authorities are fully alive to the importance of selecting thoroughly good available men. To the young organist, it should be said, let no thought of the possession or non-possession of influence disturb your determination to advance in gaining true artistic mastership. To such a one, it should also be pointed out, that a retrospective balance will show, on the one hand, a long list of musical nonentities who have through force of circumstance occupied important posts, and, on the other, a strong list of real musical notabilities who would not turn aside from their chosen and secured paths of artistic usefulness for any presumable advantages of place or position. The young organist may also be reminded that, especially in these recital-giving days, he may indeed, whatever be his local position and surroundings, if only true to the art and to himself, chalk out a career in which he will not lack either opportunities or emoluments. Meantime, it is gratifying to find distinguished artists prepared for and ready to undertake such highly responsible duties as have been recently, it is also gratifying to note, so judiciously assigned to Messrs Walter Parratt, C. H. Lloyd, and T. L. Williams. —E. H. Turpin (Musical Standard).

TO SAGRAMORE LE DESIROUS.

Sir Sagramore,—The lay that Sir Dinadan made by King Marke is among the archives of the Elyot family; for, as the Frensshe booke tells, Sir Dinadan taught it an harper that hight Elyot, and when hee could it, hee taught it to many harpers. It was the worst lay that ever harper sung with harpe, and to say that, when hee heard it at meat, King Marke was wondrous wroth, hee was; but because Elyot was a curious harper, men heard him sing the lay that Sir Dinadan had made, the which spake the most vilanie by King Marke of his treason that ever man heard. "Thou harper, how durst thou be so bold on thy head to sing this song before me?"—said King Marke; to which replied Elyot—"Sir King, wit ye well I am a minstrell and must do as I am commanded of these lords that I bear the arms of, and wit ye well that Sir Dinadan, a Knight of the Round Table, made this song." "Thou saiest well"—said King Marke—"I charge thee that thou hie thee fast out of my sight." So Elyot (wisely) departed.

The lay of Sir Palomides touching his love for "La beale Isonde" (or "Isoud"), King Marke's devoted wife, that of Sir Lamoracke touching his love for Queen Morgause of Orkney, widow of King Lot, also mother of Sir Gawaine and brethren, that of Sir Epigonis, the King's son of Northumberland, and the complaint of Sir Kay Hedius to La beale Isoud" (or Isonde), which Sir Tristram found (whereat he was wondrous wroth), are supposed to be in the keeping of Merlin, who was last heard by King Bagdemagus, groaning under the oak-tree to which the Lady of the Lake had consigned him.

(Let the gifted and adventurous maiden attack, incontinent, the venerable Abbé, and before the accomplishment of her fifth rodent, proudly assert her position as "Liszt's favourite pupil." They are all, from Von Bülow to Sophie Menter, "favourite pupils" of that mighty Canon.—Dr Blitge.)

Musical "Motives."—One of my earliest recollections is associated with a melodrama, called Broken Vows; or, The Spectre of the Haunted Glen, which I saw performed at a country theatre. The spectre and the incredulous but inconstant lover were played by the same individual, and he was the manager. I recognized him, after the performance, posting up bills for the following nights, and it was some relief to find him none the worse from having been killed in the last act, and taken from the stage to be drawn and quartered. The presence of the spectre was always indicated by a few bars of music, and the approach of the village heroine in like manner was heralded by a soft and plaintive tune. This practice has been kept up to the present day, and few of us can forget the ghost melody in The Corsican Brothers, which carried all London by its fascinating mystery. But the difficulty would be to find any drama in which incidental music is not made to denote a particular person or some striking situation. The "motives" made use of by Wagner, though as old as the hills, are a great help in illustrating a particular incident, or denoting the approach of a particular person. They save a great deal of talk, and might be made more use of even in society. The calls to extend, to close, to advance, and to retire are easily understood by musical signals played on the bugle. In the same way every person acquainted with military tactics knows the calls to halt, to assemble, to fire, to incline, to wheel, &c., and is prepared to lie down when the sound is given. Society might take a lesson from these "motives," and, by arranging a few bars of music, save a good deal of unnecessary explanation. When I was a youth we had a code of musical signals that served us upon all private or public occasions. The humming of certain notes indicated that the society we were in was a bore—that we were going elsewhere—and the answer, a continuation bar, gave the reply "I quite agree with you"—without anyone else being the wiser. These "motive" melodies, even in Wagner's Nibelung Ring, are in the highest way useful; for when the "Wotan" or the "Alberich" theme is sounded, the listener can prepare for a good half-hour's infliction, and compose himself accordingly. These "motives" emanating from the orchestra (as, indeed, does all that can be called music), singing voices hardly seem to be needed in Wagner's last productions. Good declamation would produce the same effect, if the actors' speaking voices were only loud enough. Spoken dialogue, accompanied by orchestra, has before to-day been used with effect. Out of this subject springs another, the proposal to make more use of drawings in illustrating language. Half-a-dozen lines will frequently explain what it would take a long paragraph to make clear by words. On this principle many works might be written in the highest way instructive, aiding the memory by the simplest diagram to prove that the subject is not lost sight of. I have only to refer to the "Academy Notes," a book that conveys by illustration an idea of the composition of the pictures in the Royal Academy. These illustrations may be said to present the "motive," and cannot be considered critical, nor are they intended to convey the effect of a work of art. The subject is one of interest, for music and drawing enter into the enjoyments of every-day life, and the more useful they become will be cultivated with all the greater zest.—Phosphor (Brighton Guardian.)

"The wedding of humour to music is, perhaps, one of the signs of the age. 'The Bicycle Sonata' is an illustration. At first sight it might seem that no author of standing would attempt to write of our friends the riders. There can be no question of the boldness of the attempt; the delights and vicissitudes of 'wheeling' are interpreted with skill, dramatic power and a sense of humour which raise the work and rescue it from vulgarity."

"Any music which will help to make pupils sing on the pianoforte must be of service; and transcriptions of good songs, therefore—provided only that they do not degenerate into finger display—should be always welcomed, not only for the useful practice which they enforce, but because they make young instrumentalists acquainted with the standard vocal works. In this set of three we have Haydn's 'Mermaid's Song,' Mozart's 'Violet,' and Beethoven's 'Mignon's Song' ('Knowest thou the land?'). All these, of course, do not lend themselves equally well to 'arrangement' for an instrument; but Herr Eisoldt has acquitted himself of his task with much credit. It need scarcely be said that the pleasing accompaniment to the 'Mermaid's Song,' apart from the melodious character of the theme, will render this the most popular number of the three, but Mozart's beautiful vocal gem must also attract young players, and there is sufficient variety in Beethoven's well-known song to interest even those who hanker after 'pretty' music. Very little fingering is marked, except in the 'Mermaid's Song.'"—Musical Times.

"Messrs Boosey & Co. have done good service not only to amateurs but to art, by including in their series of volumes of national melodies 'The Songs of Scandinavia' and 'The Songs of Eastern Europe.' The first-named contains eighty-three examples; and the second, a hundred. We need not insist upon the importance of collections like these, whatever the country they represent; but we must say that no musical library is complete without the songs of Scandinavia and Eastern Europe. The editor, Mr J. A. Kappey, has taken great pains to secure melodies of a genuinely representative character, and at a time when attention is becoming more and more directed to folk-tunes as a source of new thematic ideas, the volumes in question are of peculiar value. They have our most hearty commendation, the 'Songs of Eastern Europe' more especially, since the volume contains, besides examples of Liszt, Chopin, and other masters, a very valuable collection of volkslieder from the hitherto untouched wealth of the Austrian provinces."—Daily Telegraph.

"Messrs Boosey & Co. have published two additional volumes of their National Songs, which appear likely to be the most interesting of the series. We know little of the rich repertory of Scandinavian Songs, and Mr and Miss Kappey, the editors of these books, are to be thanked for introducing some of the best specimens to public notice. Five of the Russian songs are so old as to be traditional; and in the series are to be found a beautiful Cossack lullaby by one Bachmetieff, a gipsy song by Lvoff, and several songs by Warlamoff. These and the Polish songs (all of which are traditional) may be considered among the most interesting items of a small but acceptable collection. Two ancient Lithuanian songs, a couple of Finnish, and four ancient Norwegian melodies, will likewise be found in the book. The majority of the Swedish songs are by Lindblad, that prolific song writer, who died in 1864. Tradition says that the old melody of 'The Beggar Boy' was once sung in the days when she was a poor child by the distinguished artist now known as Mdme Christine Nilsson. Included in the Danish songs is the traditional 'Dannebrog,' the music of which is attributed to one 'Bay.' It would be interesting to inquire the foundation for this statement, as the origin of the Danish National Anthem was generally understood to be unknown. The tradition of the 'Dannebrog Banner,' which, in 1719, fell down from heaven to bring victory to the Danish arms, is duly recorded in a footnote. Most of the Dutch songs given date back to the sixteenth century; and there are besides three songs by W. F. G. Nicolai, and one Flemish song. Altogether eighty-three of the national songs of northern Europe are included in this valuable and interesting book. In future editions a larger preface or more footnotes, giving further particulars of the old songs whose history is known, would be welcome. Equally interesting are the songs of Eastern Europe, recently issued by Messrs Boosey, and likewise edited by Mr and Miss Kappey. Among the thirty-four Austrian songs, the large majority are volkslieder, and they include Tyrolean, Styrian, and Polish songs, two of them by Chopin. These are followed by twenty-three characteristic specimens of Hungarian songs, giving a very fair idea of the peculiarities of Hungarian music, and comprising modern songs by Liszt, and some traditional songs of Bosnia, Moravia, and Dalmatia. The first of the Bohemian songs is the 'War-song of the Hussites,' once, it is believed, the national song of the country. A few specimens of Servian, Swiss, Greek, and even Turkish melodies. The last are very peculiar; and the peculiar intervals common to this and other Eastern music are claimed by some to have been handed down direct from the music of the ancient Hebrews."—Figaro.

The piece is no child's play, but will require study. The staccato octave passages alone supply work for fire-eating players."—"Musical Standard," May, 1882.

"Harry Croft Hiller is both poet and musician, as shown by five songs, for which he has supplied both words and music. Prettiest of the group is a serenade for a tenor, 'Sweetest slumber now await thee,' which, if sung well, will make a great and favourable impression during the coming out-door season. 'Thy Dear Name' and 'In the Haven' are tender and touching songs, also for tenor voices; the latter is the better and more original of the two. More dashing and spirited are 'The Border Raider,' for a bass voice, and 'The Queen's Shilling,' for a baritone."—Graphic.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.
DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. EXCERPTS FROM PARKE'S MUSICAL MEMOIRS.

[These memoirs extended from 1784, the year of Handel's first Commemoration, to 1830. W. T. Parke, the author, was for forty years chief oboist at Covent Garden Theatre.—D. T.]

The Italian opera this season again possessed a host of strength in Pacchierotti, who first appeared at the King's Theatre in the year 1778, and, notwithstanding this was his seventh season, his voice (a soprano) was as much admired as ever, and he was still considered a most accomplished singer, though I have frequently heard him hold a note for two or three bars below the pitch, and be enthusiastically applauded for it. This might have proceeded from the Italian system of tuition, which so strictly forbids pupils singing too sharp, that it may, perhaps, occasion them to fall into the opposite defect of singing too flat. It appears to me, however, to be a hopeless task to attempt teaching persons to sing in tune whose auricular nerves are not perfectly organized. Pacchierotti was greatly admired for his vast feeling and expression, which he evinced by a peculiar mode of shrugging his shoulders and nodding his head, according to the passage. As a singer, Pacchierotti was the greatest favourite with the ladies since Farinelli, particularly with L—y M—y D—n (as old as a sibyl and as ugly as Sicorax), whose impenetrable features nothing could relax, save the Signor's fascinating song! Pacchierotti made his first appearance of the season, January 2nd, in a new serious opera, called Il Trionso d'Arania, the music of which was by Anfossi. Pacchierotti sang with great effect and applause, and in his second and last airs displayed the utmost taste and pathos. Signora Lusini, though by no means his equal, sang with much feeling. Two performers, Signora Dorta and Signor Tasca, appeared for the first time, on the 6th of January, in a new comic opera, called I Rivali delusi, the music of which was by Sarti. They both acted and sang with great animation, and were well received. Tasca's fine mellow bass voice was very striking. The fine serious opera, Demofonte, the music by Bertoni, was performed for Pacchierotti's benefit on the 6th of March to a crowded house. Pacchierotti, in the airs, "Non temer" and Handel's "Verdi prati," sang with extraordinary energy and expression, and was rapturously applauded. The performance of Signora Lusini and Signor Tasca was highly effective. Bertoni, who accompanied Pacchierotti to England, set the opera of the Orazi e Curiazi, in 1746, for the theatre San Casiano at Venice, where he was maestro of the Conservatorio. He composed operas also for most of the theatres in Italy, particularly that of Turin. His opera of Quinto Fabio, which was greatly admired in London, was originally produced at Padua, where it was performed twenty consecutive nights with great applause. Bertoni, as a composer, though he did not reach the sublime, was often pleasing and occasionally happy. The opera company was this season in some respects defective.

The grand concerts in Hanover Square, under the direction of a committee of amateurs, commenced on the 11th of February; Signor Franchi and Signora Lusini were the singers. Cramer, Clementi, and Schwarts played concertos in the first style of excellence on the violin, pianoforte, and bassoon. These concerts had emerged out of Bach's* and Abel's† concerts, which were first established about the year 1763, and continued to flourish for twenty years.

Oratorios were performed at the Theatre Royal Drury Lane on the Wednesdays and Fridays during the Lent season, and on the latter days were honoured by the presence of their Majesties. They were alternately conducted by Mr Stanley and Mr Linley. The principal singers were Mr Norris (from Oxford), Mr Reinhold, Miss George, and Mrs Kennedy. Mr Richards led the band, and Messrs Crosdill, Mahon, and the elder Parke, exerted their superior abilities in concertos on the violoncello, clarionet, and oboe. A curious circumstance occurred on the first night of this season. Their Majesties had commanded Handel's sacred oratorio, The Messiah; and from their not being any concertos between the acts, the performance unexpectedly ended at half-past nine o'clock, which never having happened before, the royal carriages had not arrived to convey the King and Queen home. His Majesty had arisen from his chair to take leave of the public, according to custom, when the Lord Chamberlain informed him of the circumstance. The King looked at his watch, and with the utmost good humour communicated the singular occurrence to the Queen. However, about a minute afterwards, being informed that his coach was ready, his Majesty, smiling, made his usual bow, and retired amidst the acclations of the audience.—(A very "curious circumstance," worth commemorating.—Dr Blige.)

The Pantheon concerts commenced on the 29th of March, in which Mdme Mara made her first appearance in England, Her sweet and powerful voice, her brilliant execution, and refined taste surprised and delighted all who heard her, and the applause she received was immense. Salomon led the band, and Crosdill and Fischer played concertos on the violoncello and oboe, with the utmost taste and effect.

On the 17th of the same month a new comic opera, called Robin Hood, written by Mr M'Nally, a counsellor of the sister kingdom, was brought out at Covent Garden Theatre. The music to this opera, with the exception of a few pieces, was composed by Mr Shield, and was, together with the rest, eminently successful. Among the most favourite pieces were Mrs Bannister's song, "The Nightingale," in which I‡ performed a brilliant accompaniment on the oboe. Mr Bannister's fine bass song, "As burns the charger," accompanied by Mr Sarjant on the trumpet; and the duet, "The stag through the forest," to the music of Dr Harrington's "How sweet in the woodlands," was sung by Johnstone and Bannister, and was unanimously encored. It is a curious fact that Mr Bannister, who never sang out of time or out of tune, did not know one note of music. He had his songs, &c., parroted to him by a worthy friend of mine, Mr Griffith Jones, who was at that time pianist to Covent Garden Theatre. The music in this opera was looked upon as the chef-d'œuvre of Mr Shield. The fine overture, which was obbligato for the oboe, was composed by Mr Baumgarten, and was universally applauded.

Although I now felt very comfortable in my situation, being honoured with the approbation of the public, possessing the friendship of Mr Shield, who wrote for my instrument, and of Mr Baumgarten, a great contrapuntist, under whom I studied composition, I did not consider the fish yet caught, my ambition prompting me to endeavour to attain the still higher walks of concerts and concerto playing; to effect which I embraced every opportunity afforded me for practice and study; and as every little helps, I had a party of talented friends every Sunday morning to breakfast with me, after which we played quartets and quintets for three or four hours. My party generally consisted of Mr Shield, Mr Dance, Mr Blake, myself, and Counsellor Howarth, M.P., one of the most distinguished lawyers at the English bar. He was also a man of agreeable manners and witty conversation, and was not only a lover of music, but an excellent performer on the tenor. The last time I met Mr Howarth was at an evening party, in the house of Mr Mayor, ex-member for Abingdon, whom Mr Howarth had lately succeeded as representative of that borough in parliament. During supper Mr Howarth invited me to dine with him the following Sunday at his country-house at Mortlake, near Richmond, which, fortunately for me, I declined, as on that day, while he and his brother-in-law, Mr Chippenden (attended by Mr Howarth's coachman), were sailing on the Thames, the boat upset, and Mr Howarth, though an excellent swimmer, was drowned opposite to his own dwelling, and in sight of his family. The courts of Westminster, in compliment to his talent and worth, were closed during the following day. As it may appear extraordinary that Mr Howarth, who was an expert swimmer, should be drowned, whilst Mr Chippenden and the coachman (neither of whom could swim) were saved, it is necessary to state the supposed cause of that melancholy catastrophe. So soon as the surprise occasioned by the boat upsetting had subsided, Mr Howarth hastened to save his brother-in-law, and holding him up with one hand, swam with the other to the boat, where, having placed him in safety, whilst several watermen were coming to their assistance, he was about to proceed to the aid of his servant; but, on quitting hold of his relative, he instantly went down like a shot. The coachman was however picked up. It was conjectured that Mr Howarth had, through excessive exertion, ruptured a blood vessel in the head; but as his body was not found for many days afterwards, that fact could not be satisfactorily ascertained.

Instrumental music had at this period arrived at a high degree of perfection, being graced with the shining talents of the following solo players: Giardini, Cramer, Salomon, Pieltain, and Barthelemon on the violin; Crosdill and Cervetto on the violoncello; Fischer and the elder Parke on the oboe; Clementi, Schroeter, and Dance on the pianoforte; Florio and Graeff on the flute; Schwarts and Holmes on the bassoon; Abel on the viol di gamba; Mahon on the clarionet; Sarjant on the trumpet; and Stamstz and Shield on the tenor.

Vauxhall Gardens (then highly fashionable) opened on the 20th of May. The singers were Mrs Weichsell (mother of Mrs Billington), Mrs Wrighton, and Mrs Kennedy (an excellent trio), and Mr Arrowsmith. Mr Pieltain led the band, and played concertos on the violin; and the elder Parke and Hook performed concertos on the oboe and organ.

This year a grand commemoration of Handel took place, by command of their Majesties, in Westminster Abbey. The following brief account of it, partly derived from my own reminiscences,

* John Christian Bach—the "English Bach," as he used to be called.

† Son of Abel and father of Adam.

(having been engaged in it,) and partly from Dr Burney's book on the subject, will probably be gratifying to the lovers of music. The first performance, a selection of sacred music from the works of Handel, was on Wednesday the 26th of May. The Abbey was arranged for the accommodation of the public, after the plan of Mr Wyatt, the King's architect, in superb and very convenient manner. The orchestra, which contained upwards of five hundred performers, was formed in a rising manner in tiers, beginning about eight feet from the floor, and increasing gradually till it reached the centre of the large painted window at the west entrance, the performers looking eastward. The splendid box erected for their Majesties, with others on each side for their suite, the bishops, and noble directors, crossed the aisle of the cathedral opposite to the orchestra, close to the entrance of the choir. The area between the royal box and the orchestra was very spacious, and was fitted up with seats covered with crimson cloth, extending from one side to the other, and galleries were ingeniously built along each side, elevated about ten feet from the floor. The admissions were one guinea each; and the curiosity of the public was so great, that although the performance was not to commence till twelve o'clock, the doors were besieged by nine. Their Majesties, preceded by the noble directors in full court dresses, with the medal of Handel, struck for the occasion, suspended by white satin rosettes to their breasts, and white staves in their hands, entered their box at twelve o'clock precisely; and when they were seated the performance opened with the Coronation Anthem, composed in 1727 for the coronation of George II., which was followed by the Overture to Esther, composed in 1720. The four bars solo, in the second movement for the oboe, was played by Mr Vincent, and the brilliant solos for the same instrument in the allegro (says Dr Burney) "were played by twelve oboes in unison, which united in such a manner as to have the effect of only one."—"Of the Dettingen Te Deum, for the peace of Utrecht (observes the same writer), which was produced in 1743, and which succeeded the former, I shall only observe that, as it was composed for a military triumph, the fourteen trumpets, two pair of common kettle drums, two pair of double drums from the Tower, and a pair of double bass drums, made expressly for this commemoration—(I beg to add that they were invented, manufactured, and beat by Mr John Asbridge, kettle-drummer to Drury Lane Theatre, at his own expense)—were introduced with great propriety. Indeed the last-mentioned drums, except in their destruction, had all the effect of the most powerful artillery." The Overture and Dead March in Saul, and the Gloria Patri, from the Jubilate, composed in 1713, were next given, and received every possible advantage from such a correct and numerous band. When this great event was in contemplation, two very pompous gentlemen, Dr Hayes of Oxford, and Dr Miller of Doncaster, came to town to give their gratuitous assistance as conductors, by beating time. After several meetings and some bickerings, it was at length agreed that Dr Hayes (Mus. Doc., Oxon.) should conduct the first act and Dr Miller the second. With regard to the third, I suppose they were to toss up for it. When the time of performance had arrived, and Mr Cramer, the leader, had just tapped his bow (the signal for being ready), and looked round to catch the eyes of the performers, he saw, to his astonishment, a tall gigantic figure, with an immense powdered toupee, full dressed, with a bag and sword, and a huge roll of parchment in his hand.

> ———The son of Hercules be justly scorn'd
> By his broad shoulders and gigantic mien.

"Who is that gentleman?" said Mr Cramer.—"Dr Hayes," was the reply.—"What is he going to do?"—"To beat time."—"Be so kind," said Mr Cramer, "to tell the gentleman that when he has sat down I will begin." The Doctor, who never anticipated such a set down as this, took his seat; Mr Cramer did begin, and his Majesty, with all present, bore witness to his masterly style of leading the band.

The second performance was at the Pantheon, on the evening of Thursday, May 27. It commenced with Handel's fourth concerto. Mr Harrison gave the air from Sosarmes, composed in 1732, "May heaven in pity," with the utmost chasteness and truth. Signor Pacchierotti sang the air, "The wily sportsmen," from Julius Cæsar, composed in 1753, in which he produced the greatest effect. Mdme Mara, in the air in Atalanta, composed in 1736, "While I retire," by the sweetness and power of her voice, delighted every hearer. The third performance, The Messiah, was in the Abbey, May 29. The church was this day crowded to excess with elegant company. Their Majesties (who, as before, wore the medal of Handel) entered exactly at twelve o'clock. In the opening of The Messiah, the recitative, "Comfort ye my people," and the air which follows, "Every valley shall be exalted," Mr Harrison delivered with his superior ability. Mdme Mara, in the air "Rejoice," displayed the utmost brilliancy of execution; and in "I know that my Redeemer liveth" her expression and pathos were so powerful, that there were but few eyes that were not moistened with a tear. The favourite bass trumpet song, "The trumpet shall sound," was uncommonly well sung by Signor Tasca, and was finely accompanied on the trumpet by Mr Sarjant. The imperfect note on the fourth of the key on the trumpet has since been rendered perfect by Mr Hydes' ingenious invention of a slide. "But now I hasten," says Dr Burney, "to speak of the 'Hallelujah Chorus,' which is the triumph of Handel, the commemoration, and of the musical art. Now, as the orchestra in Westminster Abbey seemed to ascend to the clouds, and unite with the saints and martyrs represented on the painted glass in the west window, which had all the appearance of a continuation of the orchestra, I could hardly refrain from imagining that this orchestra was a point or segment of the celestial circles; and perhaps no band of mortal musicians ever exhibited a more imposing appearance to the eye, or afforded more ecstatic and affecting sounds to the ear, than this.

> So sang they, and the empyrean rang
> With Hallelujahs."

These performances gave such general satisfaction, that his Majesty consented to honour with his presence two additional ones, which took place on Thursday, June 3, consisting of a grand selection, and on Saturday, June 5, of The Messiah. At the rehearsal of these extra performances Josiah Bates, director of them, received a letter from Mr Reinhold, the principal bass singer, stating that he was so hoarse he should not be able to attend. This caused some delay, and it being buzzed about the orchestra, at length reached the ears of old Bellamy, one of the chorus singers, whose ambition prompted him to make an offer of his services to Mr Bates in the following words:—"Mr Bates,—Sir, as Mr Reinhold can't sing, if you please I will stand in his shoes." To which Mr Bates replied, "Mr Bellamy,—Sir, we will not trouble you, as Mr Reinhold's shoes wont fit you." This disappointment was, however, soon got over by Mr Bellamy, jun. singing the part. "Of these extra performances," says Dr Burney, "nothing more need be said than that they were executed with such correctness and grandeur of effect as entitled them to still greater praise than the foregoing."

The ensuing is from a work published in 1761, entitled "A Tour through Britain. By a Gentleman."

"It was of old a Resort for Cripples: and we see the Crutches hung up at the several Baths, as the Thank-offerings of those who came hither lame, and went away cured."

Amateur Theatricals.—I have ere now remarked that the day will come when professional actors and actresses will be beaten out of their own field by amateurs, and that, when the time arrives, the professionals will have, in a great measure, to blame themselves. It need not be said that without amateurs the profession would decay for want of recruits. A great many of our present-day actors started as amateurs, and learned to walk before they tried to run. Well and good. I have not the smallest objection to any amateur actor who is working to qualify himself for the professional ranks. Indeed, I have no complaint to make against the swells who follow up amateur theatricals merely for the sake of amusement, and with no ulterior object of a more serious nature. All I want to do is, to point out to professional artists that when they consent to be patronized by the latter class, and reveal all they know of stage tricks, and of the little, but important, matters that go to ensure success, they are making smooth the way for, metaphorically speaking, the cutting of their own throats. Amateurism in recent years has taken big strides in many things, and in none more than in things theatrical. Where an amateur dramatic club was content with one or two performances in the winter months, it must now average quite a long list, which extends not through the winter only, but right along to the close of the London season, and the departure of "society" for mountain and sea. They draw a heap of money from the theatre proper; for they can always command large and fashionable audiences, no matter how familiar or stale the dish they may present. It isn't the piece the fashionables care about so much as to see how cousin Fred or brother Jack will acquit himself in it. —Referee.

A LETTER FROM HAMBURGH.

(To the Editor of the Vienna "Presse.")

SIR,—The German operatic season in London, as arranged for this year by Herr Hermann Franke, in conjunction with myself, came to an end on the 1st inst. At its conclusion, Herr Franke, as is now generally known, stopped payment, and put his affairs in bankruptcy. To avoid misconception, I feel bound, by enumeration of the annexed facts, to place the matter in its proper light. It was on the strength of an agreement made between us last year that Herr Franke and I determined to give German opera in London. By this agreement, Herr Franke alone was to bear all the pecuniary responsibility of the undertaking. In the first place, he supplied the orchestra, under the direction of Hans Richter, which he has had for five years in England, and which stands so high in public opinion. He further bound himself to rent an appropriate theatre, declaring his willingness to procure whatever was requisite, and meet the necessary expenses. Finally, the whole financial conduct of the enterprise devolved on him. I, on the other side, was, in conformity with our agreement, to undertake all the artistic arrangements. In return, Herr Franke was to give me a certain share of the profits, without any responsibility in case of a loss. The agreement has been carried out in all its details, with the sole exception that, in the case of a number of artists whose engagements I caused to be made out in our joint names, I subsequently bound myself to see their salaries duly paid. The result achieved artistically is well known, and was at the time duly appreciated by the entire press. The performances took place continuously with full houses, and the public displayed to the last a lively interest for an enterprise which was a new one of its kind. The financial result corresponded to the artistic result. The receipts were partly very good, and considerable sums flowed into Herr Franke's treasury. The fact of his declaring himself insolvent is to be explained only by what follows. As is now evident, Herr Franke went on an utterly wrong system. The renting of a whole house, at £800, as an office; the fitting-up of the same; expensive engagement of a large staff of clerks; and an irregular way of keeping his accounts, were the principal defects of this system. To this must be added that, by living in grand style, giving brilliant evening parties, &c., he incurred heavy private debts. When, during my stay in London, I remonstrated with him on one thing or the other, he endeavoured to pacify me by promises of a general nature, by referring to the very excellent pecuniary circumstances of his relatives, and the considerable amount of ready cash at his disposal. He succeeded the more easily, as, by our agreement, I did not feel justified in interfering with his mode of conducting financial matters. The inevitable result of all this mismanagement, thus concealed from me, has now come to pass. After the first payment of salaries in the season had been made, apparently without effort, by Herr Franke, he remained indebted to a part of the company for the salaries due at the end. I did not, of course, hesitate one moment, but by immediate payment satisfied the just claims of the artists engaged conjointly by him and myself. There are, therefore, no outstanding claims for salary against me. Herr Franke, on the other hand, made no attempt to satisfy anyone, except that he gave all the English orchestra cheques on a bank where he had no effects, so that, without more ado, they proved to be worthless. And yet it is as clear as day that at the time he must have had at his disposal no inconsiderable amount of ready means. Each of the last three performances brought in about 10,000 marks cash. Furthermore, he had succeeded in obtaining 8,000 marks, by borrowing that sum from Herr Karl Rosa, the manager, under a strict promise to pay it back out of a remittance made by me to ward off the catastrophe. Herr Franke had the remittance, but up to now has not repaid Herr Rosa the loan. Out of a sum of about 40,000 marks, however, which must have been the lowest amount in Herr Franke's possession at the end of the season, all the obligations of our operatic enterprise might have been discharged. As far as I can frame an estimate, instead of a deficit there ought to have been a considerable net profit. But Herr Franke called together by circular his business and private creditors, put his affairs, without rendering me any account, into liquidation, and, leaving the matter in the hands of a lawyer, went off with his family to some cool summer resort. I have a double reason for publishing the above truthful exposition of facts. In the first place, I would prevent an artistically and financially sound enterprise from being discredited by the business incompetency of one individual. In the next place, and this is for me far more important, I desire, above all things, not to see my reputation, gained before the eyes of the public by unceasing effort, jeopardized by the connection of my name with a failure due to some one else's fault. Both objects I trust to achieve by the foregoing simple explanation. Pray accept my thanks, and believe me to remain, &c., B. POLLINI.

LONDON ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The distribution of medals and awards of marks of distinction to the pupils of the London Academy of Music, by Sir Julius Benedict, took place on Saturday, July 22nd, when the occasion was distinguished by two well-sustained operatic performances from the students—namely, the first and third acts of Gounod's Faust, and two acts of Il Matrimonio Segreto. In the former work the character of Marguerite was charmingly supported by Miss Lucy Carreras, a brilliant and promising young vocalist, distinguished as a recipient of one of the three medals presented by "the Society for the Encouragement of the Fine Arts"; the other two being awarded to Miss Florence Waud, the eminent young pianist, already so highly distinguished in the concert-room, and Mr W. H. Burgon, vocalist, who admirably filled the rôle of Mephistopheles. Faust was cleverly impersonated by Mr C. E. Ellison (Gold Medalist), while Miss L. M. Browne as Marta, and Miss Elstob as Siebel, by their graceful acting and good vocalization, made the most of all that was allotted to them. The same interesting corps of performers, with the addition of Mr Reakes, acted and sung in Cimarosa's comic opera, winning well-deserved applause in every number. Miss Adelina Dinelli, violinist, Miss Salmon, pianist, and Mr C. Trew, harmonium, proved their good training and ability as the instrumentalists of the occasion. The highest honours the Academy has it in its power to bestow are the Diplomas of Associate, and these were conferred on Miss Emily Louis, Miss Edith Bros, and Miss Page. Dr Wylde, the Principal of the Institution, gave a short address to the students, and Sir Julius Benedict paid high compliments to the Academicians for the signs of progress and marked ability displayed. The performances, under the able direction of Signor Gustave Garcia, called forth expressions of unqualified satisfaction from a large and distinguished company.—The Echo.

SERENADE.*

(In the Operetta "A Story of Seville.")

Dark, dark, is the night, love,
Shine forth, 'twill be day;
Howe'er bright the morn, love,
Still night—thou away.
Stars, moonlight, and sunshine,
In thee all combine;
Thy smile is from Eden,
A sunbeam divine.

Blest night breeze that plays, love,
O'er sweet lips; what bliss,
Could I, like that breeze, love,
But steal one soft kiss.
Flowers sending upward
Their perfume to thee,
But say of Earth's blossoms
Thou queen art to me.

E'er pure in my soul, love,
Thine image shall dwell;
Each chord of my heart, love,
Vibrates to thy spell.
My love like the Ocean,
So deep is, and vast,
Not e'en can old Time, dear,
One shade o'er it cast.

OWING to a contusion of the knee, M. Vaucorbeil, manager of the Grand Opera, has been confined some days to his chamber.

MR HENRY IRVING will spend his well-earned holiday at Filey, near Scarborough. May the fresh sea-breezes invigorate and comfort him!

BERLIN.—The Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha's five-act opera, Diana von Solange, has been performed at Kroll's Theater and favourably received.—As the Friedrich-Wilhelmstädtisches Theater will shortly be handed over to the managers of the Deutsches, it will be necessary to find another home for operetta, of which the former has long been the head-quarters, and a new house is to be erected in the neighbourhood.

AUGUST WILHELMJ, after travelling round the world and remaining absent for nearly four years, has returned to Europe. He started in September, 1878, for New York, made various tours in the North and South of the States, besides visiting New Zealand, Australia, China, Japan, India, and Persia. From Persia he proceeded direct to England, avoiding Alexandria and Cairo, on account of the disturbed state of affairs in Egypt. The valuable collections Wilhelmj has formed during his travels will be kept in his house near Mosbach-Biebrich.

KOYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC, &c.

We extract the following from a long letter addressed to the Editor of the Manchester Courier, by the well-known Professor, Saint Joule, of Rothsay:—

The Duke of Edinburgh has, I admit, shown by his patronage of Mr Sullivan a disposition more favourable to the subjects of her Majesty, and possibly his royal brothers may be equally well disposed, and, so far, the earnestness they have recently displayed does them infinite credit, although, in my opinion, it is in a wrong direction; and, judging from the reports of the meetings in furtherance of the object, I cannot say that they have been very fortunate in the persons their position has enabled them to enlist as nominal collaborateurs. The meeting at Manchester was graced by the presence of the Archbishop of the province and the Bishop of the diocese. The Archbishop cited as a proof that Church music was advancing in England the alleged fact that people in church were beginning to sing in parts. The Bishop seemed scarcely to know how to talk about the subject; but he is accredited with giving it as his private opinion that he could count all the good anthems of his Church on the fingers of one hand (so much for his acquaintance with the finest collection of Church music in the world); whilst a newly-created peer opined that the presence of Quaker John Bright would have added importance to a meeting, not political, but, presumably, musical. At the Mansion House the Mayor of Liverpool spoke the truth when he said "his city could not boast of any claim on behalf of music." At any rate, the "powers that be" in Cottonopolis exhibit little appreciation of the magnificent performances of their official organist, when they permit them to be constantly marred by the chronic state of unsatisfactoriness in which their fine organ is permitted to remain. * * * * I would certainly advise intending subscribers to obtain an assurance that the professional chairs shall be filled by Englishmen. * * * * But even supposing that the college meets all the requirements with regard to nationality, the question remains as to the expediency of establishing a new institution when we already possess all we want in the existing Academy. As I stated in my former letter, the Academy has already done good work, and would have done more had the finances permitted; and I may now add, would do more if royal patronage were vouchsafed in deed as well as in name. Besides, I doubt the advantage of establishing a rival institution. Hans von Bülow has recently written an article to the Allgemeine Deutsche Musik Zeitung, in which he unmercifully protests against the "fungus-like growth of Conservatoires which has during the last fifteen years shot up all over Germany." * * * * In conclusion, I must express my regret that the exertions now being put forth are directed to the establishment of a new institution, instead of to the augmentation of the resources and the extension of the usefulness of the old and well-tried Royal Academy of Music.—Yours, &c.,

B. St J. B. Joule.

"BY THE SAD SEA WAVES."

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

Sir,—In the very amusing article published in The Era of the 24th ult., entitled "Music Walled In," to which our attention has recently been called, the writer has, unwittingly no doubt, fallen into an error as to Mr Wall's royalty rights; and we wish most distinctly that it may be put on record he has no shadow of claim over two of the songs you refer to, viz., "The Clang of the Wooden Shoon" and "By the sad sea waves." We will ask the favour of your inserting this, as it becomes a very serious matter for publishers when it goes abroad that their publications, which are, in reality, perfectly free to every singer, are supposed to be fenced round with restrictions absolutely non-existent.—Faithfully your-s, Metzler and Chappell.

37, Great Marlborough Street, July 13, 1882.

Sir,—With reference to the letter signed "Metzler and Chappell," published in The Era dated the 15th inst., I beg to state that the sole liberty of representation or performance of the words (only) of the above-named song was, for a certain money consideration paid, duly assigned to me on the 26th October, 1880, by Mr George Wood (Messrs Cramer and Co., 201, Regent Street), by entry made in the registry-book of assignments kept at the Hall of the Stationers' Company (in pursuance of the statute 5 and 6 Vic., cap. 45, section 13). The said right had been previously legally assigned to Mr Geo. Wood by Henry Fothergill Chorley (since deceased), the author of the words in question. By section 11 of the above-named statute, a copy, duly certified and impressed, of that entry shall be received in evidence in all courts, and shall be prima facie proof of the assignment of the right of representation or performance "as therein expressed," subject to be rebutted by other evidence. By section 12 of the same statute it is enacted that any person who shall wilfully make any false entry in the said book shall be guilty of a misdemeanour, and shall be punished accordingly. If Messrs Metzler and Chappell "deem themselves aggrieved" by the said entry, it is lawful for them (in pursuance of section 14 of the Act referred to) to apply for an order that such entry may be expunged or varied.

I can very well imagine that "it becomes a very serious matter for publishers" who have only purchased the sole and exclusive right of printing a song, but who have neglected to likewise buy the sole liberty of performance thereof, to find the sale of the same materially affected by the claims of the proprietor who has legally acquired the latter right. But "business is business." I never claimed any right in or to the other song mentioned in their letter.

Harry Wall.

The coming operatic season at Hamburgh will open with Glinka's Life for the Czar, Hans von Bülow, it is said, conducting.

Die Sieger.—Concerning this so-called new work by Wagner, of which so much has been written and published, the Musikalisches Wochenblatt, well-informed in matters of this kind, tells us "upon the best authority" that: "The Master gave the name of Die Sieger to a subject sketched out, more than twenty-five years ago, on a single page; since writing Parsifal, however, he abandoned his Bhuddist scheme, and has never subsequently recurred to it."

THE OPERA SEASON.

(From the "Daily Telegraph.")

Covent Garden Theatre has closed its doors, and the opera season of 1882 now belongs to the past. The question is, What has been gained or lost by it? This the managers will answer in their own way and from their own point of view, but even pecuniary results do not concern them alone. The public are also interested, and have every reason to desire that good fortune may reward enterprise, since thereupon hangs the fate of an entertainment the place of which nothing could fill. It is depressing to hear on all hands stories of evil fortune rather than good. Far from flourishing circumstances at Covent Garden, loss at Her Majesty's, and absolute disaster at Drury Lane; these things are spoken of so assuredly that the future of opera amongst us seems compromised. The lesson to be learned is this—the supporters of opera, Italian and German, are few, and appear to be getting fewer as, on the one hand, love for the higher forms of music is gratified by innumerable concerts, and, on the other, comic opera increasingly ministers to a public that craves amusement at the least possible trouble to itself. It has been demonstrated again and again that London will not support two lyric stages; how, then, could aught but failure attend the setting up of three, with a majority devoted to a form of German opera that requires in its supporters the faith of enthusiasts and the courage of martyrs? The managerial race is slow to learn, but the lesson of the present season can hardly be wasted, and will prove worth its pain and trouble, if therefrom the truth be perceived that the year contains twelve months, not three only, and that the so-called "season" has lost nearly all the operatic value it once undoubtedly possessed. The time has come when this fiction of the "season" should be recognized as such, and the unquestionable fact admitted that London is neither empty nor specially indifferent to lyric drama between Goodwood races and Easter Monday. Let us then have our Italian opera in the summer, when butterflies are on the wing; our German opera in the sad and serious days of early winter; and our English opera, as Mr Carl Rosa now gives it to us, when the returning sun speaks of a brighter time.

The warmest friends of Italian opera must concede, with what cheerfulness they may, that its German rival has taken precedence during the last few months. Nor, while admitting the fact, can they dispute its reasonableness. Teutonic art came in a new aspect, offering works the very names of which are synonymous with a world-wide controversy notorious for uncompromising give-and-take. The Germans, too, conjured with the spell of a man, who, be his faults what they may, stands forth as the greatest musical genius of the age; while the advantages enjoyed at the outset were sustained, as time went on, by just repute for merit in execution. Against all this Italian opera, with its staler charms, could do little. The musical world talked of nothing but the Nibelung's Ring, the Meistersinger, Tristan und Isolde; Richter and his orchestra; the German ensemble and the German artists. La Traviata and Il Trovatore, et hoc genus omne, even with the renowned prime donne singing their best and loudest over the footlights, were for once deposed, thrust into a corner, and forgotten. We certainly do not complain of this result. It was inevitable, and from many points of view it was just. Here let us dissociate the matter of the German performances from their manner. No reader of ours will look for an expression of sympathy with the former; at the same time we are not about to re-open a controversy from which the restful autumn should bring as much repose as the unresting Wagner—whose Parsifal lies close ahead—is good enough to allow. Suffice it that, in common with the bulk of music-lovers, we pray to be delivered from such a season evermore.* All things decay. "Leaves have their times to fall, And flowers to wither at the North wind's breath;" and natural decay, ever pathetic, is often beautiful. But premature decrepitude is never lovely, nor are the means which tend to bring it about. Wherefore the less we have the better of a form of art subtly compounded to harass the nerves and weary the brain, to say nothing of exhausting the energies of those who are its ministers. The burden of life is crushing enough without making an additional load of that which should lighten it. For the spirit and manner of the German performances, however, there can be nought save admiration, and in these things lies their chief value to us. Among the more enlightened supporters of the lyric stage discontent with the absurd practices of Italian opera has long existed. They have seen the drama and all its appliances used as a frame for the portrait of a prima donna; they have seen persons purporting to be dramatic artists who were nothing but singers in fancy dress; and they have seen the most elementary rules of the stage violated either in simple ignorance or with wilful self-assertion. These offences have not been altogether hidden by the cloak of custom; but the German representations served to expose them utterly. Even the untravelled amateur now knows what a truly artistic stage is like—that stage whose most gifted performer is but an upper servant of art, whose actors are not mere posturers, and whereon an earnestness prevails which overrides considerations of self, and reckons nothing done while anything remains to do. This model and ensample we distinctly owe to our Teutonic visitors, and it is for the public to require that it be followed on every lyric stage. Who can tell what great things rivalry of German discipline, thoroughness, and devotion might do for slipshod Italian opera? It might give new life and new charm to an entertainment which loose and inartistic habits have made vapid and profitless; and it would certainly abolish the wedding guests who contemplate Lucia's madness with the equanimity of attendants at a lunatic asylum, the performers who bow themselves out of their parts and back again at every appeal of applause, and the bouquets, supplied by contract, which go round and round like a theatrical "army." The very possibility of this strengthens desire for the return of the Germans during some portion of the year, if not in the conventional "season," when society is merry-minded. Also it intensifies regret that their return has been endangered by circumstances which, we cannot help thinking, were mostly gratuitous. Had Herr Angelo Neumann charged a less exorbitant price for initiation into the mysteries of the Ring, and Herr Franke known better how to navigate the ship he rashly ventured to command, there would now, perhaps, be no question of wrecked enterprise and no uncertain outlook.

Regarding the season for what was actually achieved, its claim to rank as memorable cannot be disputed. It introduced to English audiences the most gigantic, if not quite the most enchanting, work of modern times; made us acquainted with the beauties of Die Meistersinger and the unqualified ugliness of Tristan und Isolde; gave us the earlier works of Wagner under conditions without parallel for completeness; revived the musical charm of Weber's Euryanthe; illustrated, in the matter of Velleda, the power that yet belongs to a prima donna; and, lastly, snatched from threatening neglect and forgetfulness the representative work of advanced Italian art. Of such a season we may rightly say, "'twill serve," the more because it was hardly less deserving of note as respects artists. The last few months made English amateurs acquainted with some of the best performers in Germany, whose names it is now needless to repeat, and set us face to face with an artistic spirit in them such as we had almost despaired of meeting on the lyric boards. Then it brought Mdme Lucca back, by way, perhaps, of amend for withholding Mdme Nilsson, and revealed in full measure Herr Richter's skill as an operatic conductor; to say nothing of other revelations equally significant affecting a knot of artists whom the management of Covent Garden thought good enough for that historic house. Lastly, the season has witnessed the transference of the interests of Italian opera from private hands to those of a public company, which may or may not know how to conserve them. Out of such a period of energetic action something must come. Force is not wasted. It may go away and miss the intended mark; but it strikes somewhere, and leaves an impress. We believe that the season of 1882 sowed the seeds of good. It showed us much to accept, and not a little to reject.

We wish we could see our way to the Utopia shadowed forth by our eloquent contemporary, no less earnestly than we wish we could share his opinion as to the value of the recent German performances. Unfortunately we can do neither. Nor can we bestow a single word of regret upon their utter failure in a pecuniary sense, if only because it is our honest conviction that two or three more such seasons would suffice to throw back legitimate musical appreciation in this country for well nigh half a century. Such a quantity of vapid bombast and baseless pretension in so short a space of time is happily without precedent.—D. T.

GUILDHALL SCHOOL OF MUSIC.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—I read in to-day's City Press that Mr Dicks, of the Common Council, at the meeting at the Guildhall on Thursday last, called attention to the fact that two members of the Musical Committee had appointed their own daughters (ladies just out of their teens) to be professors. In the discussion which followed it came out that each was receiving a salary, one £64, the other £51 per annum, while the average paid to other experienced professors was £50 per annum. I was pleased to see Mr Dicks' amendment ordering the proceedings to be enquired into carried, as this system of farming out appointments by officials is much to be condemned; and the gentleman, in exposing such a system, is entitled to the thanks of the musical profession generally.—Your obedient servant,

A PROFESSOR.

DR QUINCE.—Why, F. C. B. is crossing the Oxus. How can you get at him? And will his horse ride two?

DR SHIPPING.—Oh! A farmer has shown him the nearest route from Khiva, where his horse, familiar with the country, took him by mistake, and can easily ride two, being "circus." He (F. C. B. —not the horse) meets me by appointment at the Hotel de Russie——

DR QUINCE.—Frankfort-on-Maine? That genial hostelry? Why, I have promised to join Cheese and Doublebody there. I shall walk to Bayreuth with Doublebody, who can't get into any conveyance, wheel or steam. He's a heavy traveller, and so fat that, being inconvenienced by one of his ribs, has had it extracted. He has taken five Patron-stalls, Ebrew Jew stalls—Wagner's hottest patrons are for the most part Jews—four of which he will occupy himself. He calls me his fifth rib, why fifth I don't know, but am not curious, as it brings me to Parsifal gratis. If they ask for my ticket, Doublebody shows voucher for five, and passes me in as the rib for which there is no comfortable place in his body. "I cannot do without this rib"—says he, to all who protest, on the road or at the Theatre opposite the Asylum, now exclusively inhabited by deaf advocates of the Wagnerian system. "I cannot do without this rib, and I have paid for five places, on the road and at the Theatre opposite the Asylum," &c. This is Doublebody's argument; so that I go free of cost.

DR SHIPPING.—But if the hospitable and excellent Brothers Drexel (with whom Beattie the Adventurous is so well acquainted) feast Doublebody, as of yore, it will be hard to get that Alderman away. He will abide corpulently at the hotel until transfigured. How about Cheese?

DR QUINCE.—Dr Cheese has engaged to travel with W. of W. Sir Pittman of the Coal-Mine, who encounters them at Bamberg, can put Cheese in his pocket; so that there will be only expenses for two. Besides, if, as in the first Bayreuthiad, the Niblung year, refreshment is out of hand, they may cook him. He will last out three days of Parsifal.

DR SHIPPING.—Alas! poor Cheese. (Exeunt severally.)

THE Carl Rosa tour is to begin at Dublin on the 5th prox.

MR JOHN BOOSEY'S London Ballad Concerts will be resumed on the 20th.

MR ARTHUR CHAPPELL begins earlier than usual this season with his Popular Concerts. The first concert is fixed for the 16th of October.

THE sacred excerpts from an unfinished work by the late Balfe, to be performed on the occasion of uncovering the tablet dedicated to his memory in Westminster Abbey, comprise a "Gratias ago" in B flat, for bass, a "Sanctus" in B flat minor, and an "Agnus Dei" in F. The ceremony will be held on the 20th of October, the anniversary of his death.

EXOTIC AND INDIGENOUS.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—M. Gounod gets £4,000 for his Redemption. How much did Mendelssohn get for Elijah (which, despite the "Advanced," still exists hale and hearty)? And how much did our English Handel, Macfarren (whose three oratorios are of recent days among the masterpieces of sacred music) get for his Resurrection? A very moderate sum (if I am rightly informed) was the recompense for Elijah; while for the Resurrection its happy composer was content (if I am informed rightly) with the disbursement of railway and hotel expenses, the receipts for which he joyfully bore home and placed among his family archives.—Sir, yours obediently,

AN ENGLISH MUSICIAN.

P.S.—By the way (if rightly I am informed), Sir Michael Costa was paid a large sum for his Eli, and a still larger for Naaman, both long since of world-wide celebrity, and (if informed I am rightly) he handed over his honorarium in either instance to the Birmingham General Hospital. Also (if rightly informed I am) Sterndale Bennett, for the Woman of Samaria, obtained the thanks of the Committee, and Julius Benedict, for St Peter, was cordially embraced by Mr Oliver Mason.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

A LETTER FROM PROFESSOR MACFARREN.

To the Right Hon. The Earl of Devon, President of the Western Counties' Musical Association.

MY LORD,—I have, as a member of the Western Counties' Musical Association, been honoured with an invitation to the meeting in Exeter convened by your Lordship for Tuesday the 25th inst., but, since my duties here render my presence on that occasion impossible, I have been favoured with an assurance from the Secretary that my written views on the subject shall be read to the meeting, and I therefore trouble your Lordship with this letter.

I will, if you please, remark on some of the clauses of the paper headed "Royal College of Music," which was sent me with the summons for Tuesday.

Clause I. The Royal Academy of Music is a central institution of a similar nature to the Conservatories of Paris and Vienna, differing from both as they differ from each other, according to the character and requirements of each nation. It is now entering on the 60th year of its experience. It has been honoured with the patronage of King George IV., King William IV., Queen Adelaide, Queen Victoria, the late Prince Consort, and all the present members of the Royal Family. It received a charter from the first of these sovereigns, which established its perpetual existence. It has educated several thousands of musical students, including many foreigners—composers, singers and instrumentalists—who have won European celebrity. Teachers, moreover, who are rendering good service to music in all parts of the empire have been pupils of the Academy.

Clause II. Every branch of the art is taught in the Royal Academy of Music, and the most eminent musicians, foreign and native, resident in England during the last 60 years have been its professors.

Clause III. The Royal Academy of Music has several free scholarships, the number of which is always open to extension, but the majority of its pupils pay fees for instruction.

Clause VI. The Academy is situated in a locality easily accessible from all parts of London and the suburbs, proximate to the chief concert-rooms, opera-houses, music-stores, &c., and therefore more convenient for the purpose than any place on the outskirts of London.

Clause IX. Candidates for admission to the Academy are examined as to musical aptitude, and only accepted if they show promise of success in the study.

Clause XII. The Academy not only teaches its own pupils, but holds such examinations throughout the country as test the capabilities of musical students and the efficiency of their instructors. It also examines musical artists and teachers by the aid of specialists in each branch, and grants to approved candidates diplomas guaranteeing their ability.

Clause XIII. The management of the Academy has, since 1868, been confided to a committee mainly composed of professional musicians; and highly as the Institution was esteemed before that date, public confidence in its work has prodigiously increased from the time when it was controlled by recognized adepts.

It has been stated to the Lords of the Privy Council, in reply to their Lordships' application for remarks on the proposed Royal College, that the Academy, while grateful for the interest in music evinced by His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, is willing to meet the views of His Royal Highness in any way except in surrendering its charter, which charter is so elastic in its nature as to admit of any amplification or modification of Academy work, and this reply has been communicated to His Royal Highness.

Allow me to say, my Lord, that these comments on the subject to be considered by the meeting are offered in the character of a former student and present subscriber to the Royal Academy of Music, and proceed personally from myself without any official bearing.—I have the honour to be, my Lord, obediently yours,

G. A. Macfarren.

PARSIFAL.

(By Telegraph from a Correspondent.)

Bayreuth, Wednesday, July 26.—First performance of Parsifal just over. That it was a "Patron's" performance could not be doubted. It was all patronage. Everybody was patronized. Even the Patrons themselves were patronized. Upon some of them the venerable Canon Liszt, chasing away sleep at the end of each act, bestowed a pallid smile of recognition. I am a Patron, but, though also an American, not a sworn apostle, not a Wagnerite to the big toe of either foot—not, in short, a Theodor Thomas. Well, I have heard Parsifal and don't like it—can't like it—impossible that I ever shall like it. Parsifal's son, Lohengrin, is worth tenfold Lohengrin's father, Parsifal. Then, after reading what you said some time ago, I was awfully disappointed with Kundry. Her "Leit-motive" is queer; so is Parsifal's.

* * * * * * *

* * * Materna, admirable as always for intelligence, but physically unfit for the part of Kundry. Winckelmann, as Parsifal, all that could be wished, though the character is but a spoony one after all. The other * * * * * * * * * * performance generally good, though chorus comparatively weak. Scenery and stage-business excellent—panorama ingenious and superb—orchestra, under Levy of Munich, very fine, but Levy is no Richter—Theatre crammed—Many English and Americans—After opera, speech from Wagner, proposing vote of thanks to the artists.

The Queen of French pianists, Montigny-Rémaury, has been invited to take part in the grand musical solemnity to be held at Baden, on the 9th September, in honour of the Grand-Duke. (Honour on both sides.)

Royal Academy of Music.—The examiners at the Royal Academy of Music, for the Charles Lucas Medal, awarded to William G. Wood, were Messrs Thorne, Villiers Stanford, and E. Aguilar.

The opera comica which Sig. Schira is writing, in conjunction with Mr Desmond L. Ryan, is intended, we understand, for a good-humoured "skit" on certain peculiarities of the Wagner school. The opera is to be entitled The Isle of Beauty.

Mdme Minnie Hauk, who has been spending a holiday at the Schwarzwald Hotel, in the environs of the Black Forest, has returned to Baden Baden, where she is to sing at a concert for the benefit of the English Church. She is the guest of her old friend the Baronne de Witzleben.

Mr W. H. Holmes played Sidney Gardiner's new composition, "Bitter-sweet," at Mr Diemer's concert, Bedford, last Saturday, where it produced the same effect as at Miss Stodart's concert, the previous week, in London.

The Rhenish Singers' Festival, on the 9th inst. at Bonn, was very successful. Two compositions: "Die Hexe," by Carl Grammann, and "Der Königssohn," by Haan, were the "novelties," although, a correspondent informs us, there was nothing new in either.

*A STAGE-CONSECRATIVE-FESTIVAL-PLAY.

A Lecture to the Tumbenheim Wagner Association.†

Honoured companions in art, one of the latest decrees of our Master commands us to further in our secret confederacy, by means of lectures, German intellect, German poetry, German music, or, to sum up all in one word, the cause of Richard Wagner himself. Obedient to this high order, and following also my own impulse, I appear before you for the purpose of saying a few words on The Master's most recent creation. Let us first stop a little to consider the title. Our Master calls the work a Stage-Consecrative-Festival-Play. A genial title! (Bravo! bravo!) I will go further and say: A title full of promise! (Hear, hear.) If you look through his writings, our Symbolic Books, you will find in them the avowal that he himself never really knew what he ought to call his works—that the father was always anxiously embarassed about the names he should give his children at the font; they could not well be designated operas, "especially on account of their dissimilarity with Don Juan" (loud applause and merriment); and Music-Drama—an expression which comes so pat to the more immature among us—is an unintelligible, nay, "utterly idiotic" word, altogether uncharacteristic of stage-works, which are neither dramatic in the common acceptation of the term, nor vulgarly musical. But it was indispensable that they should be entered under some name or other in the civil register of everyday art, if only to distinguish them from the common operatic rabble, and—I now quote The Master's own words—"in order to issue vigorously, and once for all, from the confusion hence arising, I hit, as is well known, upon the idea of the Stage-Festival-Play." The Master appears to have chosen the title reluctantly, simply to comply with custom; he would have preferred leaving his creation unlabelled, that it might, as "a nameless artistic fact," work in complete purity, for his art is really unnameable, an Art of the Nameless. But, thank Heaven, he changed his mind: the same thought which gave birth to the expression, "Stage-Festival-Play," created likewise the Stage for the Festival-Play, that is, the art-temple of Bayreuth, and we may well say here: The title built the temple. But I now ask, Why should not a new temple spring from a new title? (Hear, hear.) Stage-Consecrative-Festival-Play! What is a Stage-Consecrative-Festival-Play? A Festival-Play to consecrate a stage. What stage? That in Bayreuth? Impossible. The stage in Bayreuth is already consecrated, trebly consecrated; besides, it would no longer be capable of satisfying the increased demands on the machinist and the scene-painter. Then it must be another stage, which does not yet exist, and which has still to be built, must it not? Yes, my honoured companions in art, that is the secret which slumbers in one word; that is the Gospel which one word announces to us; as a coat was once composed to a button, and an opera tacked on to a funeral march, a house will in this case, believe me, be built for a title; not a common thoroughfare of a house,‡ as in Bayreuth, open to all the world and to be entered by those without a call as well as by the elect, but a carefully closed temple, thoroughly secured, a true Graal-fortress on the hill of Monsalvat, the jealously guarded hill accessible only to the true brethren, friends of the first degree, the elect of our lord and master. (Commotion.) In strict confidence I can inform you, gentlemen, The Master has already thought of the Kuhberg near Tumbenheim in connection with the object he has in view. (Indescribable and long-continued storm of applause.)

Parsifal—(a fresh outburst of applause)—Parsifal—(Bravo,

* It may be objected that "Stage-Consecrative-Festival-Play" is a strange title. I reply: It is. So is "Bühnenweihfestspiel." It may further be objected that "Consecrative" is an odd word. Again I reply: It is. I must, however, be allowed to add that Herr Richard Wagner is an author who at times does not content himself with ordinary German, and that I am compelled, in consequence, to use occasionally extraordinary English, if I would convey any notion of his style, which is, to say the least, peculiar. Perhaps some persons would, instead of the title I have adopted, prefer "Stage-Consecratial Festival-Play." If so, let them mentally substitute the one for the other, as occasion requires. "Consecratial" is certainly somewhat more uncouth than "consecrative," besides setting the usual rules of etymology glaringly at defiance. For this reason, I cannot deny that, under the circumstances, it commands respectful consideration. To another epithet, "consecrational," however, I demur. It is formed with too great a regard for the humdrum spirit of language.—Translator.

bravo). May I beg you to be calm, gentlemen, and to favour me with your entire attention? I have not yet got over the title of the new work. It is "Parsifal," with an "F," and not "Parcival," with a "V." The F is, philologically and æsthetically, of immense importance, and a world, or at least a fragment of a world as large as Arabia, lies between the two letters. The worthy Wolfram von Eschenbach writes "Parcival," as though he would derive the word from the French percer ("In truth thy name is Parcival. It means right through the middle"), and the French write "Percival," or, after Chrétien de Troyes, "Percheval, the Valley-Piercer." In the Italian chronicles the famous knight is called "Peredur," the All-sweetest, the All-fairest; and many other versions and interpretations of the word might be adduced, if it were worth while reviving an etymological dispute which has been definitely settled by Richard Wagner. Even Lessing—(at this name Common Sense wakes up and listens)—could not imagine anything more delightful for curiosity than the study of etymology, in which German philologists, and consequently The Master, have always distinguished themselves; and in connection with this point I must beg you kindly to bear in mind that he himself, the great Wagner, tells us (Symbolische Bücher, Vol. IX.) that his favourite teacher at the Dresden Kreuzschule did not bid him take to music, poetry, or any other art, but "pointed emphatically to philology as the subject I ought to pursue." That teacher was evidently a very clever man. Philology, like learned gout, sticks in The Master's limbs, and is transmitted, like a disease of the blood, to the offspring of his fancy. It is in an enchanted garden that Parsifal meets the beautiful Kundry; she is reposing on a flowery couch, "in lightly-veiling, fanciful garments, approximating to the Arabian style." Does she, amid billing and cooing, does she give the stranger anything for himself? Yes, an etymological hypothesis:

"Dich nannt' ich, thör'ger Reiner,
'Fal parsi'—
Dich, reinen Thoren: 'Parsifal.'"*

Fal parsi, Parsi fal—both expressions are in turned commas†—(Common Sense tickles the Speaker)—and we may perhaps inquire whether The Master will find the suitable musical expression for turned commas. The answer cannot, however, be doubtful. Fal parsi, Parsi fal—these words, as the lovely woman teaches us—come from the Arabic, and signify, Foolish Pure-One, Pure Fool. Thus the dispute as to the meaning of our knight's name is settled in a genial fashion by The Master's philology—(Common Sense pinches the Speaker). Ill-conditioned individuals will object that this piece of philology does not in any way belong to The Master, but to the celebrated Görres, who certainly was the first to attempt explaining by means of the Arabic the hero's name—Parsi or Parch Fal, that is, the pure, or poor Stupid-One, or Tumbe (the Imprudent-One, the Inexperienced-One)—in Wolfram's language. The geniality of the thing does not, however, consist in the happy etymological discovery, but in its dramatic application, and in the fact that philology now gains additional value for the German stage, since it has been included by Richard Wagner in the circle of the sister arts.

Parsifal—gentlemen, I cannot yet tear myself from the deeply significant title—Parsifal, I say, the Poor Stupid-One, is evidently not a mere name; it is a notion, a symbol, an allegory. Vilmar, who, by the by, like Gervinus, like Uhland, like San Marte, and like many others, writes "Parcival," and appears to have only a presentiment of the deep meaning of the Arabic F, teaches us that the young hero appears as a fool to the world, just as on its first appearance in the world the German mind does. Parcival is, therefore, the representative of the German mind, and of the German youth, and so, gentlemen, Wagner's Parsifal, also, strikes me as the representative of a German youth in general and the Wagnerian youth in particular. (Bravo!) I will go further, and say: Parsifal is Richard Wagner himself. Yes, the criminal hero, who wanders through the forest, and shoots the gently warbling birds on the branches, is none other than our Master, and, if any one doubts this, I say to him: Wagner's hero does not know what his name is, and to all questions as to who he is generally, replies with a stupid "I do not know"; he calls himself the Nameless ——; is it, therefore, not palpable, gentlemen, that in Parsifal The Master intended to personify himself and his art, the art of the Nameless? The thing appears to me as clear as day, and, when any one in future asks you the meaning of the variously interpreted word, answer boldly, Gentlemen: "Parsifal is the idiotic Wagner, and his idiotic art." (Commotion.)

Now to the real purport of the Stage-Consecrative-Festival-Play. (Common Sense, henceforth, plagues the Speaker every instant).

Respected companions in art, you are all aware that Richard Wagner writes no common dramas. Drama means action, and Stage-Festival-Play means a dream. Parsifal, like some other productions, moves in the romantically sultry, and soporific atmosphere, in which the foot forgets how to walk, and the arm how to raise itself; literally nothing happens; the dramatic element is solved by scenery, and the action by pictures; never is he who enjoys the treat rudely awakened from his dreamy devotion, nor exposed to the risk of forgetting the artist in the work of art, and, while in every other case movement is regarded as the vital principle of the stage, we are justified in declaring that principle here to be inertia. It is an uncommonly fine trait of The Master that he allows a work of such a kind, that he allows his Parsifal, to begin with sleeping, slumbering, and, perhaps, dreaming. A locality resembling "in character the northernly mountain ranges of Gothic Spain;" in it a forest, "shady and earnest, but not gloomy;" under the trees, Knights and Squires asleep; the solemn morning waking call of the trombones resounding behind the scenes. This is the first picture in Parsifal. Every touch of the pencil betrays the hand of The Master, and demonstrates his incredible skill in creating mood. How much I should like, on this occasion, to analyse the powerful effects The Master is accustomed to produce when he shows the spectators an empty stage (for a stage with the characters asleep must in a certain sense be denominated empty), or causes the music of invisible instruments to re-echo in the ears of the audience! Each is a morbid but effective over-irritation of our fancy, and we might deduct from it an entire art-theory, which is no other than the theory of the Empty and Invisible. But time presses, and we must hasten forward.

The Sleepers awake and prepare a medicinal bath for the sick Graal-King, Amfortas. The latter is unhappily sleepless from "Starkem Bresten,"‡ and his pains keep returning, each time more "sehrend" § than before. According to Wagner, who here differs essentially from Wolfram, the King once set out to "beheeren" ‖ with his spear—the same with which the side of Him upon the Cross was pierced—the magician Klingsor, but was by him entrapped, deprived of his "wond-wonderful" spear, and, with a wound which will not heal, sent home. His pain is great, but, in the bath, it is mitigated: "staunt das Weh." ¶ He goes through the same thing on the day in question. Scarcely, however, has he had the bath, ere there arises a great noise; Parsifal, an unknown youth, has penetrated unobserved into the forest, and shot with his bow a swan, as it was just flying over the Sacred Lake. Hereupon, rage and indignation among the Knights and Squires. But a reconciliation speedily follows, how or wherefore I do not know, and Gurnemanz, in Parsifal an old Knight of the Graal, offers to conduct the Pure Fool to the Graal. A changing scene takes them up Monsalvat to the Graalsburg. You must know that, while they seem to be walking, the stage is gradually transformed, and unrolls the whole road from the forest to the castle in changing pictures before you. By The Master this abiding of the characters in the moving space is thus rendered evident:

GURNEMANZ.—*Du siehst, mein Sohn, zum Raum wird hier die Zeit.

I would, however, my respected auditors, advise you not to rack your brains about this genial inversion of two such opposite notions; it is enough to drive one crazy—(murmurs)—I mean, you might lose your senses with admiration. Time here becomes space.—"Hence the wearisomeness of his music," said an enemy of The Master's. (Agitation.)

* "Thee did I name, thou foolish Pure-One,
'Fal parsi'—
Thee, pure fool: 'Parsifal.'"

† "Turned commas;" in German: "Gänsefüsse," literally, "Geese's feet."

‡ "Severe bodily suffering." Brest, from which Brestes comes, is an antiquated word, rarely used at the present day.—TRANSLATOR.

§ "Hurtful," "damaging." Sehrend is another antiquated word, fished up out of the Past to give a colouring of the period to the text, and puzzle the less philologically accomplished among the "Master's" adherents.—TRANSLATOR.

‖ "To be-host," "to be-army," i.e., I suppose, "to make war on." It strikes me that Beheeren is a special coinage of the Wagnerian mint.—TRANSLATOR.

¶ "The pain is motionless with astonishment," a poetic Wagnerianism, probably, for "the pain stops." With regard to the expression "wond-wonderful," a couple of lines previously, it is a faithful rendering of "wund-wunder," which I take to be a Wagnerism signifying "very," or "surpremely wonderful."—TRANSLATOR.

 PARSIFAL.—I scarcely step, yet I fancy I have already gone far.
GURNEMANZ.—Thou seest, my son, time here becomes space.

Stopping still, and yet advancing, we reach then the splendid domed-hall of the Graalsburg. Again does the Invisible play a principal part. Behind the stage, trombones are sounding and bells pealing; behind the scenes, half-way up 'twixt ground and dome, are heard youths', and behind the scenes, from the loftiest part of the hall, boys' voices; while, lastly, behind the scenes, from the extreme back, comes the sepulchral voice of Titurel, who is 500 years old, admonishing his son Amfortas to perform his sacred office. The poor, sickly King has to unveil the Graal; but the sight of the wonderful vessel, in which the blood of the Redeemer was once caught, renews his vitality, and with it his sufferings. Amfortas yearns for release and death; he would fain sleep, rest, die, in order that the "heaving wave of his own sinful blood" might not continually flow back "in mad flight" to his heart, and "discharge itself with wild fear into the world of sinful passions." But the invisible Titurel commands, and Amfortas must obey. The Graal is unveiled. Suddenly we have profound twilight, spreading out thicker and thicker, and traversed by dazzling rays; the sacred goblet glowing with bright purple colour; all on their knees in pious prayer; song of the invisible boys—"Receive my blood, receive my body"; blessed sigh of joy from the invisible Titurel—"Oh holy transport, how brightly does the Lord greet us to-day!" . . . Then again daylight, pealing of bells, solemn repast of the knights, songs of the youths from the middle elevation, alternating with those of the boys of the greatest elevation—"Blessed in belief! Blessed in love!" Finally, the day again dying away, all splendour and all magnificence again sinking into twilight, while Knights and Squires, amid the strains of the trombone, quit the hall; then, night and fog, a mystic I-know-not-what, a mysterious Nothing. Such, gentlemen, is the wond-wonderful picture with which The Master terminates his first act. Nothing like it has probably ever been seen before on our stage. The most solemn ceremony of the Christian Church, the Sacrament of Sacraments, the Lord's Supper, is by Wagner degraded—I beg your pardon—elevated into a highly theatrical effect, and employed scenically so happily, that the Stage-Consecrative-Festival-Play might be quite as well performed in St Peter's as in the Theatre of the Future, on Monsalvat, near Tumbenheim. And the clare-obscure which The Master has diffused over the whole, the longing change, as I may term it, between light and fog, the glowing and paling, the shining and waning, the lamentation and jubilation, the "pain of most blessed enjoyment," to use his own words—how all this will please the ladies, how it will the German lady, "that monster of European civilization and Christianly-Germanic stupidity"—(hisses)—gentlemen, the definition belongs to the great Schopenhauer, The Master's favourite philosopher. (Commotion). By the way, I recollect opportunely the admonition which Gurnemanz, at the end of our first act, addresses to Parsifal to help him along on his road: "Leave for the future the swans here alone, and, being a gander, seek out for thyself a goose!" We will leave our ladies, the lovely swans, alone, and simply inquire why poor Parsifal is called a gander. Why? Just because, to the question "Dost thou know what thou sawest?" he answered by a slight shake of the head. This is a strange, though deeply significant enfeebling of the motive in the original saga. A prophetic writing once appeared before the sick Amfortas at the Graal: When a knight one day comes and, unchallenged, asks the reason of the King's sufferings and other things, the King will recover, but the inquirer will be Graal-King in his stead. Parsifal comes, and does not ask. Hence the continuance of the royal malady; hence the vexation of the Knights of the Graal; and hence the subsequent edict that the latter are not to be molested by worldly curiosity. Because the absence of a question had occasioned such extensive mischief, the putting of questions generally was to be prohibited in future. Compare with this Lohengrin. To render more intelligible the action of the latter opera—(murmurs)—of this—that—nameless work, The Master should have taken from old Wolfram the leading motive of the question. His doing so would have rendered Parsifal's fault, Gurnemanz's vexation, and the justification of the peculiar Wagnerian term of reproach, "Gander," somewhat clearer. But this, perhaps, was the very thing which, for profoundly significant reasons, had to be avoided. The Unnameable and the Invisible are properly mated with the Obscure.

Honoured brothers in belief, Parsifal is a mystery dripping with the oil of Catholic faith in miracles. Its purport is over-poweringly religiously-immoral. (Oh, oh!) Please understand me aright. I say religiously-immoral, because The Master had necessarily to oppose to the first act a second; to Gothic Spain, Arabian Spain; to the Graal, Klingsor's magic mirror; to Christianity, Paganism; and to longing religion, religious longing. All this we find done in the second act, which passes in the enchanted castle and in the enchanted garden of the necromancer, Klingsor. This is the real scene of Parsifal's heroic deeds, which, however, are of a purely negative nature. Parsifal, you must know, has to prove his coyness in a warm passage of arms with a remarkable female, the Kundry already named. If he conquers, he is to be the Graal-King. It may easily be supposed, however, that his task will not be easy. In this particular we may rely upon The Master. In the first place, a whole hell of wildly-yearning and appropriately-undressed maidens are let loose on the poor Stupid, who, however, while beholding the "beautiful Devildom," preserves a model coldness. The maidens endeavour to fascinate him, and dispute who shall have him: "Leave the boy alone! he belongs to me!—No!—No!—To me!—To me!—Come, fair boy, let me bloom for thee! My amorous efforting is meant for your ecstatic recreation!—Take me to thy breast! Let me kiss thy mouth!—No! me! I am the loveliest!—No, I! I am more sweetly fragrant! . . . . . Are you a coward with women? . . . . Wilt not trust me? . . . . Give place! See, he wants me!—No, me!—Me rather!—No, me!—Let him be ours!—No, ours!—No, mine!—And mine!—Here! Here" All this is tolerably mild; nay, it often seems as though a genuinely poetic fragrance breathed on us from out the lovely floral throng. But this is not the worst ordeal to which our hero's virtue is subjected. In the midst of the amorous chase Kundry's voice is heard, and the fair phantoms vanish. Poor Parsifal! you have now to combat with and overcome "of most fearful impulses the hellish pressure." For thy purity there is nothing more dangerous than Kundry's beauty. That extraordinary virgin merits nearer consideration. We met her in the first act, where, wonderfully hideous—staring black eyes are expressly specified—she figured as a messengeress of the Graal, that is, she was in the service of the Most Holy; while in the second act she appears, wonderfully beautiful—slightly-veiling garments are expressly specified—as the maid of the Arabian sorcerer, Klingsor, that is to say, she is in the service of the Most Unholy. Kundry the sorcière and Kundry the beautiful, both of whom are known to you from Wolfram's Parcival, seem here to be combined in one person; and from this combination there has sprung a peculiarly duplicate being, creating Good and Evil, suspended in fear between Christianity and Paganism, an angel with a devil's face, a devil with an angel's form, something in the style of a female Faust, or Faust and Mephistopheles combined, or—Heaven knows what, for it is really difficult, gentlemen, to solve this riddle by one's own unaided skill. We must wait till the key is sent us from Bayreuth. An unspeakably profound meaning strikes me as lying in the circumstance that Kundry suffers from what seems an incurable affliction of convulsive laughter. "I saw—Him—Him—and—laughed . . ." she says to the Pure Fool, to whom she laments that, since she gazed laughingly on Him (the Redeemer, as it would appear) she has been condemned to everlasting laughter. "There I laugh—laugh—and cannot weep; only scream, rave, bluster, rage, in the continually-renewed night of madness." It is to be hoped that the explanation of these significant fits of laughter also will be shortly despatched to us from Bayreuth. Ought Kundry to be regarded as the incarnation of the Wagnerian world-view, of Schopenhauerish pessimism? Or does the laughter symbolize The Master's opinion of the attacks of his enemies, or even the behaviour of his worshippers? Kundry, by the way, is called likewise the Nameless "prime-deviless, rose of hell!" Enough: it is certain that a profound meaning slumbers in this extraordinary and obscure double being. That it should awake and be plain to us, necessitates its receiving from above a call to do so. May The Master very soon delight us by uttering that call.

Kundry laughs, my respected friends now present, she laughs—laughs—laughs—and this laughter of hers strikes me as of the highest significance, not only in an artistically philosophical, but also in a musically dramatic sense. Laughter is a natural sound, gentlemen, and this laughter, this natural sound, is really Kundry's usual speech; she despises words formed of letters, and sentences built up of words; at least, she is mostly contented with abrupt words, emitted with difficulty, words scarcely worth more than simple natural sounds, as, for instance, in the first act, when, while asleep, she floats off from the Graalsburg to Klingsor's enchanted castle, and slumbers over (a favourite motive with Wagner) from Christianity to Paganism: "Sleep, sleep—I must!" or, in the second act, when to Klingsor's vain boasting that his castle is a much more agreeable habitation than the Graalsburg, she replies, roughly and disjointedly, "Ah!—ah! Deep night! Madness! Oh!—Rage!—Oh! Sorrow!—Sleep! Sleep—Deep sleep!—Death!" But, as I have already said, Kundry's favourite idiom is the natural sound, the Inarticulated, and it strikes me as extraordinarily instructive to peruse here the carefully prescribed directions of The Master, and measure by them the demands he makes upon the representative of Kundry. In the first act, a rough voice, a simple laugh, a dull scream, and a violent trembling suffice. The last, namely, the violent trembling, is a gradation to be particularly observed, and neither more nor less than characteristic of Parsifal, where it is peculiar, and, so to say, endemic to all the personages; the phenomenon generally commences with a long "Torpidity," which gradually passes into a state of intense "Agitation," and, lastly, degenerates into the said "violent trembling," just as though behind every personage there were stationed a keeper, charged, at given moments, to "seize" the patient, and shake him till all his limbs writhed and twisted with the sacred tremor.

In the second act, the demands made upon the representative of Kundry increase after a wonderful fashion. The simple laugh and the dull scream are no longer enough. At the very commencement of the act, Kundry utters a fearful scream; she has next to indulge in "plaintive howling" of the greatest violence, graduating down to an anxious whine; then she has to laugh again either "shrilly" or "with a weird expression," and, lastly, "to fall into a more and more ecstatic laugh, finally changing into a spasmodic cry of woe." Fancy this convulsive figure, these hysterics in human shape, struggling to overcome Parsifal's virtue. At this conjuncture, she commands, it is true, some connected words, but what words! Words of unspeakable "shame-lustful," sensual heat, as suggested by orgiastic madness, and expressed in the infernal intoxication of sin. What is otherwise feeling is here caricatured into concupiscent desire, and what is otherwise passion, to convulsions. Poor Percival does not know whether he is on his head or his heels. "Oh!—Torment of love!—How everything shudders, vibrates, and quivers in sinful yearning!" But the Devil cannot master him; he merely passes, as it were, the hot tips of his fingers over the youth's skin, awakening simultaneously with evil desire the "horribly slight" recollection of the holy vessel, the Redeemer, the Saviour, God: "the ecstasy of redemption, divinely mild, permeates far and wide all souls." What did I say, gentlemen? (Common Sense shakes the speaker violently. Agitation among the audience.) I characterized the mystery as religiously-immoral. Well, you see that the "ecstasy of redemption" and "the most fearful movement of hell-like impulse" here meet in the same shudder. But, gentlemen, the mingling of religion and lewdness is not enough! This Master absolutely dares to defile a feeling sacred even to brute-beasts, dares to talk of maternal love and carnal love in one and the same breath; dares to confound the endearments of a mother with the caresses of a—harlot. Ah! This Wagner is indeed a bold and daring man! (Great applause and great hissing.) Do you deny what I say, gentlemen? Just listen how Kundry reminds the hero, Parsifal, of the love of his father, Gamuret, for his mother, Herzeleid: "Learn to know the love which encircled Gamuret when Herzeleid, burning with love, scorchingly inundated him. . . . She offers you to-day, as the last greeting of her maternal blessing, the first—kiss of love." It is true that anyone whose fancy has revelled in the spasmodic dual song of Tristan and Isolde and the incestuous scenes of Die Walküre—(Increasing tumult). . . Oh, gentlemen, your uproar will not hinder me from frankly speaking my mind—I am tired of constraint, and rejoice that my understanding is once more free—it is scandalous, I say, it is infamous, and it is shameful in us to wish to accustom our wives, sisters, and daughters to contemplate such filthy pictures without blushing crimson—nay, to regard them as the expression of the noblest poetry, while we take care anxiously to protect them from any book written with more than usual freedom, and despising the rules of drawing-room decorum. But no; you are right; Parsifal is indeed extremely moral; the hero's virtue withstands the pressure put upon it, and his purity is saved. You will, however, grant me that, on the modern stage, the danger at which virtue and purity have to tremble has never had so glaring a light cast upon it, and that never was so libidinous a game played with chastity. (Immense and increasing tumult.) Shout, rave, bawl, just as you like, gentlemen! The most you will do will be to hinder me from telling you any more about the story of Parsifal, and that is a matter of little consequence. Whether you now know that Kundry, repelled by Parsifal, "in wild raving beats her breast terribly," and calls the sorcerer to her aid; that Klingsor hurls at the youth the spear he has purloined, but that the spear, without hurting the youth, flies into his hand, and is moved in the air by him "with a gesture of the highest ecstasy as he traces the shape of the Cross," whereupon the enchanted castle, with all its splendour, sinks into the earth; that, in the third act, Parsifal returns to the Graal, heals Amfortas's wound with the wond-wonderful spear, becomes himself King of the Graal, and discharges the duties belonging to the guardianship of the sacred object; that, as in the first act, bells are pealed, trombones played, and the voices of invisible boys mingle with the voices of invisible youths behind the scenes, while on the stage light and twilight alternate, the Graal glows purple, a glorious halo spreads over everything and everybody, the dead one (Titurel) awakes, the one condemned to live (Kundry) at length expires; that the whole mystery dies away in the strains, so low as to be scarcely audible: "Wonder of the highest salvation; Redemption to the Redeemer!"——Whether you know, or do not know, all this, gentlemen, must be a subject of indifference to you and to myself. You are not here to judge reasonably, but to admire senselessly. (Cries of "Turn him out! turn him out!") To me, however—("Turn him out! turn him out!")—to me, however, I say, it seems a most marvellous thing that a writer for the stage and operatic composer—("Turn him out! treason! turn him out!")—after daring to lay hands on Wolfram's Parcifal, could derive from that joyously-emotional poem, full of healthy love of life and beautiful actuality, nothing better for the stage than precisely the undramatic element in it—its symbolicism and mysticism. It strikes me as a more marvellous fact that a fervently Catholicising work, such as Richard Wagner's Parsifal, should be written in our time in the native land of Luther and of Beethoven, in the Germany which battles for culture—(all rise from their seats, and endeavour to cry down the speaker). . . In a word, gentlemen, Art of the Nameless, Theory of the Invisible, Philosophy of the Unclear, Æsthetics of the Inarticulate—wherever you take your lord and master, you grasp a negation; his whole being—(the noise grows more and more fearful; the speaker can no longer make himself heard above it; only isolated words are audible from time to time) . . . a bloated Nothing . . . . Nihil . . . Nihil . . . (The speaker is pulled down from the tribune by some young men, and turned out of the room amid indescribable tumult.)

CONCERTS.

Mr John Thomas gave some of his pupils, who are undesirous of making a public appearance, an opportunity of showing, at a private concert held at his residence on Thursday afternoon, July 20th, their artistic skill upon the harp, of which their instructor is so consummate a master. Miss Florence Chaplin and Miss Haldane opened the concert with a duet for harp and pianoforte by Steibelt; Miss Gunston and Miss Nellie Gunston assisted Mr John Thomas in the trio, "Miserere," arranged from Il Trovatore; while the Honourable Miss Mary Anne Maxwell undertook more exacting duties in the grand duet, in E flat minor, for two harps (John Thomas), the other performer being the composer. Two of the young ladies, Miss Maxwell and Miss Chaplin, were also heard in harp solos by Alvars and J. Thomas. Master J. Barker, a professional pupil we presume, gave "The Mandoline" (Alvars) with capital effect, bidding fair, at some future time, to approach the excellence of his accomplished master. Miss Ellicott sang, with winning simplicity of style and purity of voice, "There be none of beauty's daughters" (J. Thomas); Mdme Edith Wynne displayed her fine voice and remarkable powers of expression in a Welsh song, "Britain's Lament;" and Miss Beata Francis gave an agreeable rendering of "My home is cloud-land" (Sir J. Benedict). During the concert Lady Benedict performed with rare skill upon the pianoforte.—P. G.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

As there seemed to be but one dissentient voice in the meeting called to hear Mr Grove on Tuesday last, I should be glad to be allowed space to explain the position of the small minority. Everybody must agree with Mr Grove, as everybody did, that it was desirable to further as much as possible music both as a science and an art; if possible, too, to build up an English school of music. If France and Germany have their recognized schools, although, speaking accurately, Germany has no unified school, there is no reason why efforts should not be made to resuscitate what, at present, we have lost in England. The labours of Purcell and Arne ought to be carried on by living representative musicians. The nucleus of such a scheme, however, already exists; and it is to the detailed portion of what Mr Grove had to urge that I should wish to take exception. Through good report and through evil report, the Royal Academy has been doing work which its worst enemies cannot fail to recognize, and which, under the most trying circumstances, has shaped and moulded whatever musical talent has come to the front in the country. Its late principal was Sterndale Bennett; its present head is Prof. Macfarren; its first Mendelssohn scholar was Mr Arthur Sullivan. Here, at any rate, we find three names, representative enough, which can testify to the teaching and to the staff of the Royal Academy. But what the Academy has sorely needed throughout its career has been money—a solid fund upon which it could fall back at any time. "The largest scholarship"—so said Mr Grove with apologetic frankness—"which the Academy possesses only reaches £40, and we must have much larger sums than these." The country, then (for this is the upshot of Mr Grove's speech), is, first of all, asked to subscribe largely to advance a scheme which inevitably must overshadow all others. We should then have some recognized standard. We should have, in a word, such a conservatoire as Frenchmen possess, and of which Frenchmen are proud. But the country is asked to go a step further, and subscribe to a National College of Music which has, to all intents and purposes, been in existence at South Kensington for some years past—a college which has failed. What amount of money the Duke of Edinburgh's scheme at South Kensington has already handled and spent, how many scholarships presented to it by the larger towns have outspent themselves during the last few years, Birmingham, Nottingham, and other towns can tell. Under whatever name the money is to be given, the thing to be secured is the establishment at South Kensington; and the establishment at South Kensington has failed. By all means, if there be the wish for a conservatoire, let us enlarge the borders of the Royal Academy—give it a new name; put new blood into it; appoint more men to the professorships who would have a recognized standing in the country. Give, too, if possible, to Mr Grove himself a fine position on the governing body, for all musicians can appreciate, and thankfully, his untiring devotion and his unselfish aims. But such a detailed scheme as Mr Grove evolves, in the name of Royalty, is a scheme that, so far, has come to hopeless grief; and no amount of fine names nor fine people should induce practical Englishmen to throw over a hard-working body of gentlemen—for this is inevitable, say what we will—in order that a rickety edifice, with a grand name, should be kept from tumbling. I could wish that some professional man had given expression to the foregoing views.

So long as the English people continue to admire self-help, so long will they support such institutions as the Royal Academy of Music, Trinity College, and other educational bodies. It remains to be seen whether the authorities of the Royal College would not do well to claim for themselves a position entirely disentangled from the formerly existing National Training School. — Bath Evening Chronicle.

Theatre in the Tuileries closed with L'Infante di Zamora and Le Nozze di Dorina.§

The reader perceives what a great enterprise the Théâtre de Monsieur was, and what important services it rendered art. Amid the incessant difficulties created for it by the political state of affairs in France, then so profoundly troubled, the theatre originated by Viotti and Léonard, and carried on by them with such gallantry, courage, and activity, assumed in Paris an exceptional rank, and succeeded in obtaining numerous and legitimate marks of sympathy. If we look at it merely from a musical point of view, the first thing we find is that in the space of three or four years it introduced to public notice, either in their original shape or in the form of translations, most of the admirable masterpieces of the contemporary Italian school, executed by a group of such incomparable artists that the like of them have never been found again; and, a few years subsequently on its becoming the Théâtre Feydeau, when the Italian singers left it, we see it always animated by the same energy, the same feeling for art, and the same desire to do things well. It was then that, gathering around it all living forces, calling to its aid all musicians of any promise or any reputation, Berton, Boieldieu, Méhul, Dalayrac, Lesueur, Steibelt, Devienne, Gaveaux, Kreutzer, Jadin, Champein, and many more, it followed up one new work with another, and began with the Théâtre Favart the brilliant and prolific struggle, so full of magnificent splendour, so profitable to the young French school, and creating an epoch in the history of our national art. In these two respects, Cherubini rendered it immense service, in the first place by assisting it to make known the great works of the Italian composers, his fellow-countrymen, to which it frequently happened that he would add some exquisite pages; and secondly, by writing for it the beautiful French scores, Lodoïska, Médée, Les deux Journées, &c., which contributed to the glory of its stage and established his own.

* This is a bit of trickery for which I am unable to account; the work was really a French comic opera, and the person concealed beneath the imaginary name of Zaccharelli was Champein.

† The first performance of Paisiello's Barbiere was delayed by the occurrences of the middle of July which brought about the capture and destruction of the Bastille. We read in the Journal de Paris for the 14th: "Though the performances at the theatres were announced yesterday and the day before, they never came off." In this same number for the 14th, the space usually filled with theatrical advertisements is a blank. This is the case, too, on the 15th, and the advertisements do not reappear till the number for the 21st, when they are followed by this notice: "The receipts of all to-day's performances will be handed over to the Mayor of this town to be employed for the benefit of those poor persons who have suffered most from the present state of affairs."

‡ "The Théâtre de Monsieur was the first to put the names of the actors in the bills (8th December, 1789). The Comédie Française did not imitate this example before the month of February, 1790, and the Académie Royale de Musique not till the 5th May, 1791. Even then it mentioned only the principal singers and dancers." CHARLES MAURICE: Histoire anecdotique du théâtre et de la littérature, vol. I., p. 16.

§ Here is the programme of this closing performance as given by the Journal de Paris in its issue of the 23rd December: THEATRE DE MONSIEUR. To-day, for the closing, L'Infante de Zamora, a French opera, parodied from the music del signor Paisiello, in which the Demoiselle Parisot will make her second début, and the thirteenth representation delle Nozze di Dorina, Italian opera, music by Sarti, a sudden indisposition of Dame Mandini preventing the performance of La Pastorella nobile. To commence at 5½ o'clock.

Morning prayers at St. Matthew's, Sheffield, on a recent Sunday, were—according to a local paper—marked by an incident of an extraordinary and an amusing character. Shortly before service, Mr E. Hobbis, organist, was puzzled to find some keys fastened down as though the "trackers" had been cut. Having obtained professional assistance, an examination of the organ was made, when a cat was discovered in the interior. All attempts to coax the animal from its place were unavailing. The service proceeded smoothly, but when, after the sermon, Mr Hobbis attempted to play the accompaniment to the "Amen," discordant strains were emitted from the instrument. The last hymn was sung without accompaniment. Just as the hymn finished "puss" made her escape, and, bounding along the middle aisle, gained the street.

MORCEAU DE SALON,
FOR THE PIANOFORTE.
By
LILLIE ALBRECHT.
Price 4s.
London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"'Fantaisie Marziale' is the title of Miss Lillie Albrecht's latest addition to her already numerous list of Morceaux de Salon for the pianoforte. This young lady writes for her instrument almost as well as she performs upon it, and her compositions are invariably characterised by elegance and brilliancy. The present piece is no exception to the rule, but manifests in some respects an advancement in mastery of device and effect that justifies us in encouraging Miss Albrecht to persevere until she can undertake even more weighty tasks. The 'Fantaisie Marziale' comes well within the reach of the ordinary player."—Sunday Times.

"There is an ample supply of dash and spirit in Lillie Albrecht's 'Fantaisie Marziale.'"—Graphic.

"Next I would call attention to the brilliant and effective pianoforte piece recently published by the popular young pianist, Miss Lillie Albrecht, a 'Fantaisie Marziale,' a work that will be found acceptable by all who wish to possess facile and bright pieces. It is my duty no less than my pleasure to encourage ladies in all their artistic efforts."—Lady's Pictorial.

"Miss Albrecht is not only a pianist of remarkable power and ability, but a composer of very elegant music for her 'instrument de prédilection.' This spirited 'Martial Fantasia,' in G major, boldly asserts its title, and is indeed a stirring effusion, that might be made effective, in score, for a military band. The piece is no child's play, but will require study. The staccato octave passages alone supply work for fire-eating players."—"Musical Standard," May, 1882.

"Harry Croft Hiller is both poet and musician, as shown by five songs, for which he has supplied both words and music. Prettiest of the group is a serenade for a tenor, 'Sweetest slumber now await thee,' which, if sung well, will make a great and favourable impression during the coming out-door season. 'Thy Dear Name' and 'In the Haven' are tender and touching songs, also for tenor voices; the latter is the better and more original of the two. More dashing and spirited are 'The Border Raider,' for a bass voice, and 'The Queen's Shilling,' for a baritone."—Graphic.

"Three songs by Harry Croft Hiller deserve praise, inasmuch as the composer has been successful in writing his own words rather prettily. We like best the serenade, 'Sweetest slumber now await thee.'"—Sunday Times.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.
DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. GERMAN OPERA.

The London season, now terminating, has been remarkable for the abundance of German music, that, for the time, never failed to entertain amateurs, to occupy the pens of critics, to cause bickerings between partizans and opponents, and in the end to bring heavy pecuniary losses upon all concerned in its production. But whatever misfortune may have befallen speculators and persons employed, it is certain that some portions of the public have been gratified and benefited by the manifold opportunities afforded them of making further acquaintance with Wagner's operas. Two of our largest theatres, Her Majesty's and Drury Lane, were set apart for the production of the Master's "music-dramas," while little else than German music has found place in concert programmes; so that London, as far as music is concerned, has been for the last few weeks more rabidly Teutonic than any Continental city. It would need a musical Solomon to settle the disputed claims of those who, on one side, contend that Wagner, in his compositions, is dull, ugly, and vicious; and on the other, that he is sublime and spiritual. Perhaps the majority of the public, calmly looking on, are ready to use the sneering words of the Dean of St Patrick—"Strange all this difference should be," &c.* But all who know better the earnestness of the wranglers are prepared to admit the purity of the aim of those who strive to preserve excellence attained, as well as of those who labour to extend the boundaries of musical art. On one point, the effect of these recent works upon the old style of singing, there will, perhaps, be little contention, for Wagnerites have no hesitation in saying that the school of vocalization prized by earlier composers has not been considered, and further, that it has not been deemed even worthy of preservation. If any lovers of music went to the Germans expecting to find examples of vocal facility they were disappointed, for during the entire season little or nothing of that manifestation of art has been heard. Night after night the visitor might have listened to works, in many respects, of wondrous skill, to orchestration of marvellous variety, and to combinations that exceptional power alone could form, but seldom or never could he hear phrases showing the refinement generally associated with the art of singing. Whilst passing by the embellishments furnished by the singing master, not caring for trills, shakes, turns, or scale passages, whilst willing to concede that these ornaments are after all unessential, yet the trained ear could not but be continually offended by the unevenness, harshness, and hoarseness of tone which too often marred the efforts of the performers. The principles of the singer's art, which are an unconstrained delivery of the voice, with perfect command, and a sustained beauty of tone, with modulating power; these things have been with the Germans sacrificed to strength of lung and throat. Whereby the charm of vocal inflections, and the gradations of sound that spring so naturally from ever-changing emotion, with the tenderness and persuasiveness of utterance by which one heart moves another, all seem imperilled, if not absolutely lost, by the stern demand made upon the singers for force, and force, and more force.

The German artists, however, in the performances both at Her Majesty's, and Drury Lane, have seldom failed in giving exceedingly fine examples of declamatory singing. On all occasions, and from all concerned, from those sustaining leading characters down to humble supernumeraries, that one essential attribute of declamation, earnestness, was ever present. Through husky notes, through false intonation, through the roughest tones, this earnestness lit up and imparted life to every sentence. Who, indeed, heeded blemishes of execution when the soul of the performer shone in his work? Who could stop to cavil at uncouth phrasings in a foreign language, when they were made to carry straight from one heart to another, from actor to auditor, the feelings and emotions called up by the actual scene? Yes, there was much for the English student to learn from the exponents of Wagner's operas, for before him were men and women of musical attainments, who, whether in leading or subordinate characters, whether filling the stage or occupying nooks almost out of sight, were never found to be above their work, but, sinking personality, gave to their parts for the moment the undivided efforts of their utmost being. True it is, that this very earnestness appeared to be destructive of vocal grace and polish, for, like soldiers, who, by bodily scar and hacked armour, show traces of ruinous war, so the singers gave tokens in damaged voices of the injury wrought by constant strain. Listeners, however, could not but pity them under such a hard taskmaster as Wagner, who gave them, as it were, music-bricks to make with scarce a straw of melody. How did he come to appreciate his countrymen as mere declaimers, not singers, and to feel justified in apportioning them nothing but bare, wearying, killing recitatives? In any case, the vocalist, with his art, has been sacrificed, whilst the orchestra has been elevated to the place of honour. In the orchestra Wagner finds a medium for the expression of his thoughts without let or hindrance; there always are at his command the full resources of the realm of sound; there, like an engineer relying upon science instead of manual strength for moving the forces of nature, he escapes from human constraints. How cleverly has he carried out his purpose! and how slavishly has every musical instrument fulfilled his behest! With the time came the man, and the slighted operatic orchestra bounded to the front as the honoured ambassador of Wagner's intellect.† Still, however, the singer could not altogether be put aside; he was needed upon the stage for the eye to rest upon, if not to tell the tale, while the orchestra unburthened itself of the quaint fancies and precious thoughts consigned to it by the author. Although Wagner retains the singer, for the words are still declaimed in vocal tones, the singer has really no fuller share in the melodic treasures of the orchestra than the exhibitor of the crown jewels has in the collection of precious stones he prates upon. Listeners must not, therefore, imagine that the shouts of Wagnerian singers are shouts of joy; no, watch well, and it will be seen they are conscious that all the good things have been thrown into the pit below the footlights. Yet shout they must. How can they do otherwise, for does not the band rage furiously? No one knows better than a singer of the modern school that one special quality is absolutely necessary for his work, the quality of strength to sing both high and loud, and, unfortunately, he quickly learns that the use of this force destroys all other vocal attributes. So, whatever the future outcome of Wagner's theories and practice, which, in accordance with a widespread opinion, will to a large extent militate for good, it is certain that the art of vocalization needed to adequately illustrate Handel and Mozart is in danger of becoming a thing of the past.

PENCERDD GWYFYN.

* Which were not "the words of the Dean of St Patrick."—Dr Blinge.

† From this we are to conclude that Mozart and Beethoven, Cherubini, &c., in their dramatic works, showing no knowledge of the orchestra, might have profited by the study of Wagner's scores. O Gemini! Wagner might do worse than, "with anxious polyscopity," peruse the score of Rossini's Guillaume Tell.

MUSIC AT BOULOGNE-SUR-MER.

(From a Correspondent.)

A change in the troupe of M. Bérard has taken place. M. Leopold Ketten, Directeur du Conservatoire de Genève has taken the place of M. Idrac; and Mdlle Romi, from Lyons, has arrived, and has been singing in several operas. In the last act of La Favorite an incident occurred which occasioned a titter among the audience, but did not disconcert Mdlle Romi, who was equal to the occasion. As Ferdinandi assisted Leonora to rise from the foot of the cross, the skirt, worn under the monk's robe in which she is disguised, gave way, and clung affectionately round her feet; Leonora, however, did not "respond," but kicked it away with tragic energy. A serious accident happened the other day to our première chanteuse, Mdlle Levasseur, who fell down and broke her leg. She is, consequently, obliged to resign her engagements, which every one regrets, as she is a great favourite. M. Bérard has engaged Mdme Hasselmans to replace her. She will appear as Marguerite in Faust to-morrow night, and continue with us till the end of the season. M. Ketten has been singing well in La Favorite and Le Postillon de Longjumeau. Ambroise Thomas' Hamlet is announced for Saturday.

X. T. R.

Boulogne-sur-Mer, July 26.

Vaucorbeil, of the Grand Opera, having recovered from the effects of his recent accident, has again taken up the reins of management.

FORM, OR DESIGN, IN VOCAL MUSIC.

After Pizarro's song, he and Rocco speak a few words, and then the former unfolds his project of revenge against Florestan, the prisoner; and with the more emotional character of the words is a return to musical setting. Numerous different sentiments are expressed, each with its own musical idea, in a long chain. With the exception of a short piece of recitative in the middle, all these ideas are rhythmic, though in varying rhythm. Many different keys are used with the different ideas, but all are grouped in accordance with the main principle of key-form. The key of A, the main key, preponderates at the beginning, with F and C as transient modulations enclosed within A. After this many new keys are gone through, each made clear before the next is touched, and without reference to A. Then follows a portion in which A is again the predominating key, others being used within it as transient modulations, and followed by a coda in A. In what we may call the first part, that which bears relation to the main key, Pizarro is abrupt and authoritative with the gaoler, tells him if he will be quick about it he has a chance of making his fortune, and offers him money; and, when Rocco enquires what he is to do, tells him he is to execute a State offender. All this Pizarro says with a bold front, and his assumption of boldness prevails over the different ideas and joins them in one; Rocco's enquiries, too, are simple; the music is, therefore, the continuous development of ideas in the same train of thought, and the varying keys are all in relation to the main key of A. But, after Rocco has pushed his questioning further, matters become more complicated. Pizarro is forced to avow he is to and from that follow Pizarro's persuasions and arguments, Rocco's frequent ejaculations of disgust and dread, Pizarro's declaration that he will himself do it, Rocco's recognition that the victim is the man "who scarcely lives, who like a shadow moves," and Pizarro's direction to Rocco to prepare the grave, and he will then steal down into the dungeon and

Ex. 189.

Ex. 190.

Ex. 191.

Ex. 192.

All these manifold and constantly changing ideas fall into the part which we may compare to the second part or fantasia, and the musical ideas and keys rapidly change throughout—the ideas new, the keys distantly related. From this moment Rocco's scruples are silenced, he thinks that the victim is half dead already, and that death will be a release to him—the only end of despair; Pizarro is sure of the content which he cannot have while Florestan is alive—argument is over, and the thing is settled to be done. These are somewhat more restful emotions, and, therefore, fit into the third part, in which the musical ideas are less changeful, in which the keys are less changed and bear closer relation to the main key, and the rhythm is more continuous. A slight interruption to the continuity of the third part is the reiteration of Pizarro's declaration that he will steal down to the dungeon and kill Florestan, but, with the exception of one phrase (Ex. 192), it is with new music.

In the introduction to the overture, No. 4, in E, is a passage which seems to be a reminder of the thought above of the starving prisoner (Ex. 191).

Immediately upon the exit of Pizarro and Rocco, Leonora rushes in; she has overheard the agreement between the two, and is mad with excitement. The changing emotions of her mind find expression in a long soliloquy, set as a scena and aria with many different ideas. The scena is full of agitation; the emotions are active and rapidly changing. Leonora's first thoughts are of horror; Pizarro is a fiend, is without pity, he is a tiger. These thoughts come pouring out in accompanied recitative, with interludes of great impetuosity. At the mention of pity, there is a gentle phrase which is driven away by the thought of Pizarro's tigerish nature. Presently a thought of Hope comes, which spans and illumines Leonora's troubled mind as a rainbow over a stormy landscape, and the voice of the singer is, as it were, upheld in mid-air by the sustaining notes of the flutes and hautboys.

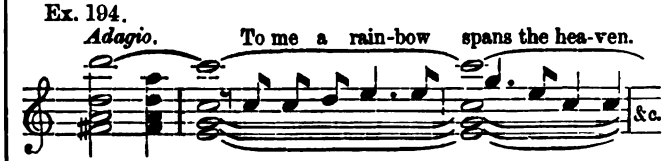
Ex. 194.



This suggests a new train of thought, and Leonora dreams over a prayer to Hope, dwells on the thought, and finds comfort in it; and it is expressed in music by long cantabile phrases in even continuous rhythm and regular form. This is the slow movement of the aria. The thought is carried on for a few phrases in the main key (E), and then in the key of the dominant (B). After a full close in the latter key, the half-way rest, the main key returns for the second division of the movement with ideas which are but the carrying out of the first. The horn passages, first in the introductory bars and again in the course of the air (a) and (b), form a sort of companion strain to that of the voice. On the close of the slow movement, thoughts of confidence come into Leonora's mind. An inward guide draws her on; she will not hesitate, but will be strong with the duty of true wifely love. A quick movement expresses this, which has been already described as a modern example of the Scarlatti form.

The beginning of the overture, No. 4, in E, bears a great resemblance to the music of this movement, and must be felt to be characteristic of the same emotion.

This scene for Leonora follows the preceding duet for Pizarro and Rocco in natural sequence, and, therefore, the keys of the two movements are closely connected. A, the main key of the duet, is the chromatic concord on the supertonic of G minor, which is the first key used in the scena; and the first group of notes in the scena belongs equally to both keys. Again, the principal key of the aria (E) is that of the dominant of A, the principal key of the duet.

Decided action is now being taken by the Metropolitan Board of Works in dealing with the theatres. The Prince of Wales's, Royalty, and Vaudeville are among the houses which for practical purposes are condemned, and important alterations will have to be made in others.

MR AND MRS TAYLOR gave their annual entertainment (Music and Recitations) at their residence, Adelaide College, Shepherd's Bush, on Monday, July 24th. The progress made by the pupils must be highly satisfactory, both to parents and instructors. As a pianist Master H. Mandeville (pupil of Mr Frank Holmes) exhibited his proficiency in Clementi's pianoforte sonata, Op. 36, No. 4; and as a reciter, Master E. Mandeville (pupil of Mr Taylor), in "Le Meunier sans souci." Both Mr and Miss Taylor contributed to the gratification of the visitors, the lady by her performance on the pianoforte of a well-known Bourrée, and Mr Taylor by reciting several familiar and admired pieces.

ORATORIOS AFTER SUNDAY SERVICE.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—I should be glad to see the custom introduced by Archdeacon Dunbar, of singing selections from one of the oratorios after the service on Sunday evenings, made more general. It would, doubtless, financially benefit the churches, as well as intellectually benefit the congregations. The Hymn of Praise is quite a sermon, while the story of Elijah is well told and vividly brought before the mind by the power of Mendelssohn's music. There is nothing of a party spirit in the singing of such music in churches and chapels. Last Sunday evening the story of Elijah was first read from the Bible, and then selections from the oratorio, Elijah, were rendered by the choir at St Andrew's, Tavistock Place (which still continues open). The soloists were Miss Jessie Royd (soprano); Miss J. Petersen (contralto); Mr Burgess Webb (tenor); and Mr Baines (bass). I am, sir, yours, with respect, N. W. L.

[The more we hear of such music as that of Mendelssohn in our churches, the less chance is there of the pernicious doctrines of the Lisztites making head.—D. T.]

Miss Rosa Kenney has been the "rage" during the past season at the réunions of the "upper ten thousand," reciting with genuine effect, among other poems, Tennyson's "Lady Godiva" and "Morte d'Arthur."

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—The prizes gained by the pupils who have been studying in the Academy throughout the past academical year were distributed on Saturday by Lady Goldsmid, in the concert-room of the institution, Tenterden Street, Hanover Square. Prior to the distribution Professor Macfarren (the Principal) said that they had met to crown a year of anxious work and a month of the deepest interest, in which the pupils had been examined by a series of Boards of Professors in each department with great stricteness, and with the endeavour to find out, not the faults, but the merits of the candidates. There would doubtless be many heart-burnings and disappointments among those who had obtained neither medals nor commendations; yet that was a circumstance which should not discourage them, but rather stimulate them to renewe exertions in the coming year. They should also remember that, however symbolical to the world of art a medal or commendation might be, the real prize was in the endeavour they had made to deserve the prize. Young artistic talent was as watery vapour that filled our atmosphere, which, when it lighted on a leaf or a flower, became a dewdrop; the leaf was as the counsel of the experienced teacher, which condensed the water into the dewdrop, and the dewdrop was the matured genius of the artist. The memorial prizes to be distributed had been instituted by one or other generous person or by general subscription; while the annual prizes were the result of the recent special examinations. Their thanks were due first to the various professors for their almost parental interest in their pupils, and next to the eminent musicians, who, though wholly unconnected with the Academy, had superintended the examinations and made the awards, it being felt that that would have been a painful, invidious, and perhaps doubtful task to be undertaken by the professors who had prepared the pupils. Their thanks were also due to the directors of the Crystal Palace for the free tickets which they had placed at the disposal of the committee for the concerts and concert rehearsals which had taken place at that institution. Lady Goldsmid then distributed the prizes. The Charles Lucas silver medal was awarded to Mr William G. Wood, the Parepa-Rosa gold medal to Miss Hilda Wilson, the Sterndale Bennett prize (a purse of ten guineas) to Miss Lilian Munster, the Llewellyn Thomas gold medal to Miss Kate Hardy, the Evill prize (a purse of ten guineas) to Mr John G. Robertson, the Heathcote Long prize (a purse of ten guineas) to Messrs Arthur Dace and Septimus Webbe, conjointly, and the Santley prize (a purse of ten guineas) to Miss Beatrice Davenport—all of whom had won distinction. With regard to the annual prizes, in the female department, the certificate of merit (to pupils who had previously received silver medals, being the highest award of the Academy) was gained by Miss Annie Cantelo (pianoforte), Miss Annie Balfour (pianoforte) receiving a commendation. In the male department certificates of merit were awarded to Messrs Alfred Izard (pianoforte), Frank Arnold (violin), Walter Thomas Barker (harp), and George John Bennett (harmony). On the motion of Professor Macfarren a hearty vote of thanks was passed to Lady Goldsmid, who expressed her gratification at having assisted on such an important occasion in connection with their truly great and national institution. Among the professors present were Messrs H. C. Banister, C. Steggall, E. Fiori, P. Goldberg, William Shakespeare, H. R. Eyers, Walter Macfarren, Brinley Richards, Harold Thomas, Prosper Sainton, and Sir Julius Benedict.

But it was not without having to contend with grave and formidable obstacles that the Théâtre de Monsieur pursued a career so full of interest and so deserving of encouragement. The famous day of the 6th October, 1789, by bringing back the King and Royal Family from Versailles to Paris, ejected it from its home. After the sovereign returned to the Tuileries, the theatre could hardly remain there, and so a short time subsequently it was obliged to move. This was a disaster. Where could they go in the middle of winter, and where suddenly find shelter for so vast an undertaking? There was, it is true, some talk of building a new house, but to do so would take time, and meanwhile the management were obliged to evacuate the Tuileries, where, as we have seen, they gave their last performance on the 23rd December. It is certain that at that moment they had no notion what they should do, for they inserted the following notice in the Journal de Paris of the 24th: "To-day and to-morrow there will be no performance. The public will be informed by fresh bills when and where the performances will be continued." At last they succeeded in finding a temporary home; it was not, as Fétis somewhere says, a barn, but the building which the Variétés Amusantes possessed at the Foire Saint-Germain, and which, in a word, was very comfortable. But it was far removed from the centre of Paris, and singularly small for an establishment with so many persons employed in it. However, be this as it might, the Théâtre de Monsieur, after seventeen days' inactivity, was reopened on the 10th January, 1790, at the Foire Saint-Germain, where it was destined to remain a year. And this again is how, in its number of the 9th, the Journal de Paris announces the fact:

"Theatre de Monsieur. To morrow the provisional season will commence in the house formerly occupied by the Variétés, at the Foire Saint-Germain, with Il Barbiere di Siviglia, Italian opera, mus. del sig. Paisiello.—Those persons who ought to have had their boxes from Christmas to the 31st December are informed that the performances of which they were deprived by the closing of the Theatre will be made up to them either in other performances or in money, as they may choose."

While the concern was in its temporary quarters, the management purchased at No. 19, Rue Feydau, a large plot of ground, on which Legrand and Molinos, two architects of high reputation, set about rapidly erecting a new theatre, which, even before it was opened, was thus described in a special work of the time:—

"The house will be able to contain about two thousand two hundred persons; it forms a perfect semi-circle, so that the actor when in the middle of the stage will be at an equal distance from all the spectators, the farthest of whom will not be more than thirty-two feet from the front of the stage. There are eight tiers of boxes, though only five are visible. The means of ingress and egress are roomy and commodious. The entrance is under cover of a superb vestibule. A carriage with six horses can pass under the latter, while another carriage is leaving by another issue, and, so to speak, depositing its occupants at the door of their box. Every one can, if needs be, have all his servants under his eye, without their having to fear the rain and the rigours of the season, because round the house there runs a vast circular gallery, the interior of which will be fitted up with all kinds of shops, where all tastes may be satisfied, while the eye is flattered. All the places are comfortable, and there are seats for everybody."

Despite the difficulties of all kinds caused every day by its temporary installation in a locality both defective and insufficient, the Théâtre de Monsieur continued to display at the Foire Saint-Germain the activity which constituted at the Tuileries a part of its good fortune. In this second year of its existence, it got up some forty more new works, among which there were some twenty Italian or French operas. The Italian operas were La buona Figliuola, by Piccinni; La Grotta di Trofonio, by Salieri; Le Gelosie villane, by Sarti; Il Geloso in Cimento, by Anfossi; Le due Gemelle, by Guglielmi; La Frascatana, by Paisiello; Don Chisciotte della Mancia, by Tarchi; L'Italiana in Londra, by Cimarosa; and a pasticcio entitled I Viaggiatori Felici. As for the French operas, they were not on this occasion all translated from the Italian, but included various works due to some of our own composers, such as Les Roses de Frontin, by Champein (though, like other of his works, given under the pseudonym of Zaccharelli): Azélie, by Rigel; Joconde, by Jadin; L'Amant travesti, by Desaugiers; and L'Histoire universelle, by Cousin Jacques.

At the expiration of a year, the house in the Rue Feydeau was at length ready, and the management began to think about inaugurating it. In the last days of December, 1790, the performances of the Théâtre de Monsieur at the Foire Saint-Germain were brought to a close, and, after a few days, during which there was necessarily no performance while the moving was going on and the transfer of the staff effected, the new house was opened on the 6th January, 1791, by Le Nozze di Dorina. The Théâtre Feydeau—such was the name it thenceforth assumed—had now a home of its own, in the very heart of all the life and elegance of Paris, and was destined again to enjoy the sympathy, only more lively than ever, which it had so promptly and so justly excited. Unfortunately, events followed one another quickly, and obliged it materially to modify the conditions of its existence. The troubles of which Paris was at this time incessantly the scene, dealt, as may be supposed, a heavy blow to the prosperity of theatrical enterprise. The Théâtre Feydeau, with its enormous expenses, was doomed to feel this prejudicial influence more than any other house, and its situation became more and more difficult, because new dramatic and lyric theatres were springing up every day in virtue of the decree of the National Assembly, which had established the most complete freedom in such matters. It was necessary, therefore, to think of economizing, and, when the theatre closed, at Easter, 1792, the comedy company was dissolved. Soon afterwards, the Italian singers discharged themselves. The day of the 10th August threw them into a state of terrible affright, so, taking advantage of a special clause in their engagements, they resumed their liberty, and fled in all possible haste. But it was fated that the disorganization should not stop here, and the management itself was, nearly all at once, thrown into confusion. Léonard, who had been mixed up in the flight to Varennes, was compelled to leave France and take refuge abroad; Viotti, who had been on affectionate terms with the Queen, and formerly been received as an intimate friend at Court, but whose ideas, though at bottom liberal, did not protect him from certain dangers, also found himself obliged to go into exile and flee to England; even Martini was reduced to hide in order to escape the perils which threatened him. In this state of things, the French singers remained in exclusive possession of the Théâtre Feydeau. Hereupon, they resolved to form themselves into a joint-stock company, and carry on the enterprise with French comic opera alone.

This rapid historical summary of the beginnings of the Théâtre Feydeau is not without its utility. Cherubini was so intimately, so closely, and so usefully mixed up with them, he was to such an extent the pivot, we may say, on which everything turned, and, a few years later, he became so vigorously one of its firmest supports, that it was not a superfluous task to describe with some minuteness the enterprise to which he owed the most solid foundation of his renown in France, and which caused his glory to flash forth its first rays.

By his engagement with Viotti, Cherubini, in return for a fixed annual salary of 4,000 francs, undertook to compose all the pieces it might be judged expedient to add to the Italian operas played at the Théâtre Feydeau, and to write two French operas every year. The salary was not large if we recollect that the French operas, belonging by agreement to the management, brought the young artist nothing in the way of author's rights; but it was a piece of good fortune for him, even under these conditions, to be able to make his works known to the French public, and get the latter to appreciate them. Besides, the obligation was not onerous, for, though engaged from 1789, he did not bring out his first work, Lodoïska, till 1791, and his second, Elisa, till 1794. He wrote, it is true, an almost complete work, Koukourgi, which was never played, and the first act of another, Maryuerite d'Anjou, never finished; but this was a very different thing to the two scores he was bound to supply every year, and on which the management never insisted, because, having doubtless too many works already at their disposal, they would have found it impossible to present them to the public.*

THE FIRST PERFORMANCE OF PARSIFAL.

Bayreuth, July 27th, 1882.

The first day of the Stage-Consecrative-Festival-Performances has whirled noisily by with all its peculiarity and passionate aberrations. It did not succeed in reaching the dazzling physiognomy of 1876, but all the special features of that year remained, while the absurd and senseless extravagances of the Wagnerian craze—though any one would have thought such a thing impossible after the Nibelungen days—were greater than ever. But, despite all their blustering outside the Theatre, the Wagnerites could not convince us impartial folk that Wagner's last work was on a level with some of his previous productions, and far less that it marked a step in advance. I will not now go minutely into the first night's performance, an account of which you have doubtless received from other sources, but will content myself with sketching certain details of the kaleidoscopic scene presented yesterday on the Stage-Festival-Play-Hill. Bustle and turbulence reigned, it is true, in the surging and hurrying mass of human beings, but there was, after all, a want of the characteristically interesting element which marked the August days of the year 1876. The Wagnerites from all quarters of Germany and other countries were certainly fully represented, but whether they were able to impart a special expression to the physiognomy of the Festival is what I always doubted; after yesterday evening, I feel certain on the point. The full-blooded Wagnerites are beings like will-o'-the-wisps, without originality or independence, whom, therefore, we may pass by without more ado. We will allow them with all our heart their blind enthusiasm for Wagner and their exaggerated ecstacy at his creations, but they should have enough consideration not to weary with their skill in coarse pen-and-ink warfare persons who think differently from themselves, and do not choose to follow them in their unexampled worship of an individual. We have certainly heard nothing as yet of acts of violence and "Schopenhaueriades," but we have had sufficient and convincing proofs of the utter want of tact distinguishing the exaltados. The Wagner community, as already mentioned, was fully represented; the Intendants, Löe and Perfall, for instance, of some Court Theatres, and the managers, like Neumann and Förster, of private ones; journalists and authors, like Frenzel, Ehrlich, and Lindau, together with the leading representatives of the Vienna critics, conductors, stage-managers, and theatrical artists, had all been attracted by a sense of professional duty to the Stage-Festival-Play-Hill; but none of Germany's leading poets were visible, nor does it appear that the names of any other world-renowned individuals are to be recorded. The house has been subjected to no alteration inside since 1876. The view of the vast pit, rising amphitheatre-like, is thoroughly pleasing, while the whole place with its simple architecture produces a stately and noble impression; it is dedicated to the culture of the fine arts, and worthily does it prepare the audience to enjoy them. But there are two things to which the normally thinking theatre-goer can never be reconciled, the concealed orchestra, and the deep obscurity which reigns during the performance. I have known for years the Munich Orchestra and the admirable work they do, having followed, with the most lively interest, their restless energy and artistic excellence; yesterday they played in as masterly a fashion as ever, and fully bore out their reputation, but they would have achieved more, and produced a more direct effect, had not the sound of their instruments been compelled to issue from their mousetrap into the deep night of the house. The obscurity reigning in the auditorium grows at last perfectly unbearable; the attentive spectator who wishes to follow the course of the action, the frequently unintelligible utterances of the artists, and the extraordinarily complicated text, finds it scarcely possible to distinguish from each other the letters of the book. And now how about the way the work was received? The fanatical Blätter, for which a farce more or less does not matter, will speak of an enthusiastic success. Was this really so? With my hand on my heart, I say, ye Wagner-worshippers, no, it was not! The feeling after the first act was very friendly, although by no means enthusiastic; after the second, the dramatic animation and melodic wealth of which, with perfect justice, delighted the audience, the applause was the expression of perfect satisfaction. The third act, with its endless length, fatigued and disappointed, despite certain very beautiful passages. The physiognomy of the town had visibly changed since midday; from all quarters the trains brought visitors, and the good, worthy women of Bayreuth may have gravely shaken their heads at many an extravagant toilet which appeared to have come direct from the workshop of some Parisian tailor gone mad. Of course, with so great an influx of visitors, the lodgings-question has entered a new phase; the prices which have to be paid for rooms are simply shameful, and, making every allowance for the extraordinary circumstances of the case, the Bayreuthers should remember that there are newspapers which register such overcharges, and put the public on their guard. A praiseworthy exception is that of the respectable inns, which, though raising their ordinary prices, have by no means soared into the fantastic regions of from twenty to twenty-five marks a day, as many persons have been pleased to do. An especial song of praise should be sung to the local telegraph office. The officials have worked admirably, quickly, and reliably, having sent off two hundred telegrams with more than 14,000 words during the performance. Yesterday's Bayreuther Blätter contains "a fresh appeal to all our old friends" in reference to the continuation of the body of patrons, and to-morrow a special meeting will be held to consider the subject.—Nothing certain is yet known concerning the visit of the King of Bavaria, a circumstance which might have been expected, in view of the suddenness with which that Monarch is accustomed to make his arrangements; no definite information has reached either the Hermitage or the Castle here. A great many visitors already leave to-day, but will be replaced by new arrivals to-morrow.

Léonard obtained, at the end of 1788, permission to start the Théâtre de Monsieur, and to carry it on with a company of French actors, a comic opera company, and an Italian opera company, Viotti put me down for 4,000 francs a year, dating from 1790, on condition of my composing all the pieces required in the Italian works, and also two French operas. This was the first appointment I held in Paris. In 1791 I brought out, therefore, the opera of Lodoïska at the Théâtre Feydeau, which then bore the title of the Théâtre de Monsieur, and subsequently the opera of Eliza, ou le Mont Saint-Bernard. As these two works were, in consequence of my position, the property of the management, I had no author's rights. I then composed another opera entitled Koukourgi, according to my agreement, but it was not performed. I may observe that the above-named salary of 4,000 francs was paid me by the management in assignats at their nominal value till 1793, without my having any allowance made in proportion to their diminished worth. At last the payment of this salary stopped in 1796 or 1797 (I do not recollect the precise epoch), and, my engagement with the management of the Théâtre Feydeau being terminated, I should have been without employment if, luckily for me, the decree of the National Convention of the 18th Brumaire, Year II. of the Republic (8th November, 1793), creating the Institute of Music, and afterwards the law of the 16th Thermidor, Year III. (3rd August, 1795), changing the title of Institute into that of Conservatory of Music, had not procured me a place as inspector of studies in the establishment, to which I was appointed with a salary of 5,000 francs and a residence.

IN MANUS TUAS, DOMINE.*

"In Manus Tuas, Domine," let this my last prayer be,
And ere my weary eye-lids close, yield I my soul to Thee,
Oh, guard me from all evil, keep me from peril free.

Oh, may Thine angels guard me through the dark hours of night,
Especially my Guardian who, with wings of shining white,
Doth hover o'er my couch, bright messenger of light!

Into Thy hands, O Lord, I commend the coming day;
Oh, lead me in the narrow path, be Thou my Guide and Stay.
'Tis Thine, O Lord, to give or take, Thy will be done alway.

"In Manus Tuas, Domine," the dying Saviour saith.
"In Manus Tuas, Domine," e'en with my failing breath:
Be this my latest prayer, ere mine eye-lids close in death.

Yon breaks the bright, eternal Day, and earth's vain shadows flee;
Awake, my soul, rouse from thy sleep, prepare thy King to see,
For Earth's dark night hath pass'd and Heav'n's morn dawns on thee.

SCHOPENHAUER v. WAGNER.*

It is well known that, in the year 1854, Richard Wagner sent copies, printed at his own expense, of his poem, Der Ring des Nibelungen, as a "confidential communication" to certain friends, and such persons as he supposed entertained a feeling of sympathy for his project. This edition never came into the hands of the publishers. One copy was forwarded by Wagner to Arthur Schopenhauer. Many years subsequently, it was said that, in this copy, after the stage direction at the end of the first act of Die Walküre—"Siegmund draws Sieglinde to himself with furious and ardent passion; she sinks with a shriek on his breast; the curtain falls rapidly"—Schopenhauer had written the pungent marginal commentary, "High time it should." As Wagner not merely without reserve avows his adhesion to Schopenhauer's views of music, but claims to have incorporated, poetically, Schopenhauer's philosophy in Der Ring des Nibelungen, the presumption that in his copy the great philosopher had written many a critical opinion of the Tetralogy could not fail to excite curiosity. I have at length seen the copy in question, in the possession of Herr Leo Lipmannssohn, to whose kindness I am indebted for the opportunity of examining it. On the blank page, before the title, we see written in Schopenhauer's hand: "Arthur Schopenhauer," and, under the title, in Wagner's: "In token of admiration and gratitude." The book, an octavo of 159 pages, contains all the four pieces of the Nibelungen Poem, but the third piece, afterwards called Siegfried, bears for title, Der junge Siegfried; while the fourth, afterwards called Die Götterdämmerung, is denominated Siegfried's Tod. Schopenhauer has enriched the book with numerous marginal notes, in pencil. The handwriting is everywhere vigorous, broad, and legible. In the first act of Die Walküre, in the great love scene between the sister and brother, Sieglinde and Siegmund (page 42), Sieglinde yearns for the man of her wishes. To this Schopenhauer remarks, continuing the speech by a double hyphen: "Go and murder thy husband."† On the same page we find: "Sieglinde thrusts back the curls from Siegmund's brow, and, plunged in amazement, gazes on him with the words, 'How open is your brow, the temples, &c.!'" On this Schopenhauer remarks: "It is infamous!" With reference to the scene generally between Siegmund and Sieglinde, Schopenhauer writes across the entire margin at the top of the page: "We may for once in a way forget morality, but we have no right to slap it in the chaps." Much marginal space is taken up by the philosopher's quaint remarks on the purport and inflated language of the text. The sharpest bit in this valuable autographic treasure trove is the exclamation: "Ears! Ears!" which Schopenhauer always employs whenever Wagner makes false and inharmonious verbal combinations. With his well-known genial roughness, Schopenhauer, at one such tortured word-formation, even says: "He has no ears, the deaf catgut-scraper!"‡ This literary historical discovery will cause great commotion in the Wagnerite camp.

The number of students during the past term at the Milan Conservatory was 217, of whom 101 belonged to the gentler sex. Albino Gorno, formerly pupil at the Conservatory, is appointed singing-master in the College of Music, Cincinnati, U.S. There is some talk of producing Tannhäuser next season at the Scala, with Sylva as the infatuate minstrel, or of re-producing Lohengrin with Barbacini.

‡ "Er hat keine Ohren, der taube Musikant!" Musikant, here rendered "catgut-scraper," is so frequently employed contemptuously that it may be said never to be used otherwise, and, therefore, is a very different word from Musiker, a "musician."—TRANSLATOR.

WAGNER'S PARSIFAL.§

So we are sitting again in the pleasant little Bavarian town of Bayreuth, once rendered celebrated by worldly splendour and twice by intellectual power. Half a century ago, solitary Jean Paul enthusiasts piously sought the place, and six years since whole caravans of admiring Wagner-worshippers also made a pilgrimage thither. Yes, quite six years have elapsed since the "Stage-Festival-Playhouse" was first opened, in order to conjure up as though by magic the four days' wonders of Wagner's Nibelungenring. Since then the strange edifice on the hill has remained closed, and the dusty and hot road leading to it deserted. Things were planned differently, very differently. Wagner hoped to have performances every year, nay, even intimated that there was a prospect that his theatre, with a constantly enlarged field of action, would be open to every kind of dramatic creation entitled, by originality of conception and legitimately German style, to claim a specially correct representation. But no one ever believed Wagner would perform any but his own works in Bayreuth. And this is quite as it should be, for to hear a good rendering of Fidelio or Don Juan we do not require to go to Bayreuth, while still less was there any need of erecting a specially constructed theatre. More worthy of credit and more reliable appeared perhaps the other promise, namely, that the Nibelungen Cycle should be repeated annually in Bayreuth. This was the logical consequence of Wagner's decided and public declaration that he would not allow his Nibelungen Trilogy to be given on any other stage. Of the permanent nature of this prohibitory resolution, however seriously it may have been at first intended, we, however, doubted from the very outset, venturing, as far back as 1876, to prophecy that, after Europe had travelled to Bayreuth, Bayreuth would have to come to Europe. And so it has turned out—to the real advantage of the work and its originator. The prophet has come to the mountain, and, during the last six years, the Nibelungen Trilogy has found its way to all Court and Town Theatres of any importance in Germany. But the Wagner Temple in Bayreuth remained shut. It is only now that it again opens its portals to admit a new work, Parsifal, which, by the designation: "Stage-Consecrative-Festival-Play," Wagner invests with unusual significance.

In the choice of his subject, Wagner has ascended in a double sense: genealogically, from Lohengrin to Lohengrin's father, Parcival; and, metaphysically, from something of a mythical to something of a mystic and specially Christian purport. The soul of the entire work is the "holy Graal,"‖ the wonder-working dish or cup which was preserved on Montsalvat by the knights called after it, and in which Joseph of Arimathea is said to have caught the blood of Him who died on the Cross. Already, as an invisible power, working from afar, it brought about the catastrophe in Lohengrin ("Mich ruft der Gral!"¶) In Parsifal, it constitutes the visible and central point, the supreme power ruling every motive in the drama. Only some one thoroughly pure, and not trying to find the road, can reach the Graal and be admitted among its knights. Such an innocent youth, a stranger to the world, is Parcival, "the pure fool," who, being selected for it, first neglects and misses, but, after severe trials and gradual moral purification, finally executes his high mission. As we are aware, the knightly poet, Wolfram von Eschenbach, taking as foundation various sagas, and especially the poem of the Frenchman, Chrétien de Troyes, celebrated Parcival at the commencement of the thirteenth century in an epic as full as it is profound and rich in colour, and in which he combines the series of sagas concerning the holy Graal with those relating to King Arthur's Knights of the Round Table. Wolfram von Eschenbach, who—being in this respect the direct opposite of Richard Wagner—could neither read nor write, has served as the principal if not exclusive source whence Wagner has drawn his materials. It is a happy coincidence that the latest, or Wagner's Parcival, should rise up in the same country, Bavaria, nay, in the very Franconian province, where Wolfram's home stood six hundred years ago. Eschenbach lies south-east of Anspach, and is not, therefore, very far from Bayreuth. It was in Wiedenberg, probably Wehlenberg near Anspach, that Wolfram had his house, living there, poor but contented, with wife and child. He died, far advanced in the fifties, about 1220, and was buried in the Frauenkirche, Eschenberg. Thus the northern Bavarian province, which includes, among other places, Bayreuth, reminds us of the first and unsurpassed poet of Parcival—Wolfram von Eschenbach. Probably, only our learned readers, historians of literature and Germanists, have gone deeply into his poem. A far larger circle derive their information concerning him and his Parcival from old works on literature; more recently, perhaps, from Wilhelm Hertz's careful monography; or, lastly, from Wilhelm Scherer's admirable History of Literature, now being published in numbers. A third set consist of the respectable minority who, in all probability, know Wolfram von Eschenbach only as the melodious minstrel of the Evening Star in Wagner's Tannhäuser. This, by the way, ought to suffice for the right comprehension of the "Stage-Consecrative-Festival-Play," since a properly constructed drama, whether spoken or sung, should explain itself, without learned preliminary studies.

While narrating the substance of Wagner's poem, we shall momentarily dismiss Wolfram's Parcival from our mind, and not notice till subsequently certain divergences of importance to the drama. Wagner's Parsifal——but hold! We must of necessity stop a moment at the hero's name, the Bayreuth mode of spelling it having already produced considerable confusion. Wolfram calls his hero "Parcival," from the French verb percer (Fürwahr, dein Nam' ist Parcival; "recht m i t t e n d u r c h bedeutet er").* Chrétien de Troyes calls him "Perceval" (Valley-Piercer†), which is allied to the former meaning.‡ To try and derive from the Persian and Arabic words of undoubted French origin is a learned freak in which previously only Joseph Görres delighted, and Gervinus has dealt with his false derivations. Wagner, who really does not require yet dearly loves to be great in trifles and original in subordinate things, violently derives the indisputably French name from the Arabic, in order to force upon it the meaning of "pure Fool." In the second act he makes the corruptress, Kundry, explain his hero philologically: "Thee did I call foolish Pure One, Fal parsi—thee, pure Fool: Parsifal!"§ It strikes us that the fact of the name Parcival having been for more than 600 years naturalized in literature by one of our greatest poets is sufficient to make us still adhere to it, and ignore any arbitrary alteration. The title of Wagner's Festival-Play must of course be quoted literally as Parsifal, but, in other cases, the non-Wagnerian world will continue to write "Parcival" as formerly. We will now proceed from Parcival to Parsifal.

The first scene represents a woodland spot in the northernly mountain ranges of Gothic Spain. We see Knights and Squires rise from their slumbers beneath the trees to prepare a medicinal bath for the sick Graal-King, Amfortas.‖ The latter is sleepless from "severe bodily suffering,"¶ and his pangs keep returning more and more "acute." As we learn from the lips of the Knight, Gurnemanz, Amfortas sallied forth one day to "behost"†† with his lance—the same which once pierced the Redeemer's side—the wicked magician, Klingsor, but was deprived by the latter of the "wond-wonderful spear,"‡‡ and despatched home with a wound which will not close. There now comes the repellantly wild but willing Graal-servant, Kundry, who rushes "hastily," nay, almost "staggers" on the stage. She brings from Arabia a balsam to cure the sick King, and flings herself, exhausted, on the ground. Scarcely has Amfortas taken the bath, which "stems his pain,"§§ when a confused noise is heard coming nearer and nearer. A youthful stranger, Parsifal, has forced his way unobserved into the wood, and brought down with his arrow a swan that was just flying across the "Sacred Lake." The offender is conducted before Gurnemanz, who proceeds to interrogate him. To the questions: "Whence art thou? Who is thy father? Who sent thee hither? What is thy name?" the Youth always replies: "I do not know." There now arises in Gurnemanz's breast a suspicion that the Youth, a perfect stranger, who has thus unaided found his way into the wood, may be the individual selected to save the sick King, for an oracle—though certainly a very obscure one—has, to comfort the latter, said: "Through pity knowing—the pure Fool; await him—whom I chose." Gurnemanz bids the Youth follow him; the road to the Gralsburg|||| opens for them of itself, and a moving scene represents the progress of the two up steep rocks and through mountain-passes. At length, they find themselves in a hall which derives its light exclusively from an opening in the vaulted cupola. The sound of bells and the voices of invisible boys are heard. The Knights of the Graal take their places at long tables, and King Amfortas is brought in on his couch. From a niche in the background comes the voice of the venerable Titurel, who lives on in the grave, revivified every day by the miraculous power of the Graal. Titurel summons his son to perform his holy office, and uncover the latter. With bitter lamentations at his own unworthiness, Amfortas obeys, and unveils the sacred vessel, while the boys' voices intone the formula of the Christian sacrament: "Receive My blood for our sake! Receive My body, that ye may remember Me!" The Graal glows with purple light, the tables are seen to be now supplied with bread and wine, and the Knights sit down to the meal provided by the Graal. Parsifal remains dumb and motionless as well at the unexpected splendour as at the King's groans of pain. To Gurnemanz's question, whether he knows what he has beheld, he shakes his head; whereupon the Knight thrusts him out through a side-door, with the extremely unpoetic words: "Do thou for the future leave the swans here alone, and, gander as thou art, seek thyself out a goose." Thus ends the first act.

The second act transports us to Klingsor's magic realm "on the other side the mountains." The wicked magician calls Kundry, "Hither, Kundry, up to thy master!" On being thus summoned, Kundry, amid bluish light, springs out of the ground, uttering a "fearful scream," and then bursting into a "plaintive howling." Who is this Kundry? How comes it that she, the ever-willing servant of the Graal, is here as Klingsor's ministering demon! A riddle in the first act, she appears in the second as a fresh riddle, and that which is to give us the key to these opposite characters is only a third and still greater riddle. Kundry, it must be stated, is not only the true attendant of the Knights of the Graal, and at the same time the devilish Klingsor's pernicious accomplice, but moreover a mystic relic, a living petrifaction of the time of Christ! The wicked Herodias who laughed on seeing the gory head of St John the Baptist, and the heartless Jewess who laughed at the Redeemer on His way to death, and who was afterwards condemned, like a female Ahasuerus, to a life without end of anguish and everlasting laughter, are both Wagner's Kundry in one person. Klingsor, who has sometimes power over her, employs her in leading astray the Knights of the Graal who journey to the Fortress. At his command she, whom we beheld in the first act repellantly ugly, now appears in all the beauty of youth. She has, in time gone by, helped to seduce King Amfortas, and now she has to try her arts on Parsifal, who at that moment is approaching in "childlike ecstasy." A magic garden, full of luxuriant floral splendour, receives the "pure fool." From all sides, beautiful girls in attire "hastily flung on" rush forward. They surround him, at first reprovingly, then coaxingly, and lastly, arraying themselves in lovely garments of flowers, attack him with amorous blandishments. He endeavours to escape from them, when Kundry, young and beautiful, in "slightly veiling fanciful garments," appears and calls him by name. She talks to him about his mother, Herzeleide, telling him how that mother loved him and died. She gives him "as the last greeting of a mother's blessing—the first kiss of love." With this kiss a "fearful transformation" takes place in him; out of the tumult of awakening and mad sensuality he falls, without any intermediate preparation, into the extreme of religious ecstasy. He suddenly thinks of Amfortas's wound, accuses himself of the deepest crime, and then violently pushes away Kundry, who presses on him with ever-increasing warmth. At her cry for assistance, Klingsor appears on the battlements, and hurls the holy spear at Parsifal. The spear, however, remains poised in the air over the "pure fool's" head. Parsifal seizes and flourishes it, describing as he does so the form of the Cross, whereupon Klingsor's magic castle disappears as though in an earthquake.

The third act plays considerably later; at least, when we see Gurnemanz again he has grown to be "a very old man," and is a hermit. The scene represents a pleasant locality in the domain of the Graal. It is Good Friday. Gurnemanz finds, in a hedge, Kundry, lifeless and stiff. He awakens her into life. In appearance, she is, as at first, ugly, but her old wildness has left her. Parsifal enters in black armour, with the sacred lance in his hand, seeking the way to Amfortas. In the highest rapture, Gurnemanz greets the promise of happiness implied by the recovery of the spear. Parsifal has appeared as deliverer at the right moment, for, on that very day, Good Friday, the Graal is to be exhibited for the last time at Titurel's funeral, and then for ever to remain concealed. The Three start for the Graalsburg, but not till they have presented us with a surprising and vivid picture from the New Testament; the repentant Kundry washes Parsifal's feet, and dries them with her flowing hair, while Gurnemanz anoints his head with balsam, and greets him as the Graal-King. Parsifal takes water in his hand from the spring, and baptises Kundry in the Christian faith. The moving scene of the first act soon leads them to the Gralsburg, where the Knights are standing in the greatest grief around the catafalque of the dead Titurel. Amfortas in despair tears apart his dress, exposes his open wound, and begs for death at the hands of the Knights. Parsifal now enters, and, with the words: "One weapon only avails aught—the spear alone that made the wound can close it," touches the King's wound with the sacred lance. The King beams "in holy ecstacy," and staggers with deep emotion. Parsifal, however, raises the spear high in the air, when behold! holy blood flows from the point. The Graal is uncovered, and glows with light. The dead Titurel rises to pronounce a blessing in his coffin, while a white dove, the symbol of the Holy Trinity, flies down from the dome and alights on Parsifal's head. Kundry sinks inanimate to the ground, while Amfortas and Gurnemanz, kneeling, pay homage to the new Graal-King, and we hear the subdued tones of the mystic final chorus:—

"Wonder of the highest Salvation!
Redemption to the Redeemer!" *

FROM BAYREUTH 22 OF JULY (From our Teutonic Correspondent).—It is reported that the "Meister" (Wagner) has given the "Parole" that he and his artists want to be alone, as so it is that the gates of Stage Festivalhouse, are closed to every one who has not to do direct with the "Gral." The fear, the coming —— might be too soon, before profane eyes, is the cause, that not only to the rehearsals no one is admitted, but the aproach to the theatre outside is forbitten — — — Many visitors, coming from distant lands, for the first time, coming, were at the gates of the theatre refused. The porter discover in the light suited dress, an Englishman or an American the harmless Englishman and the Jungler American reporter, and a reporter is the most despicable enemy at a rehearsal. Not a week ago an American reporter succeeded to get behind the pillow of the royal bolt, in spite of watchmen and the managercounsel, he was however discovered, and set out quickly in the open air. Since then the safety police are on their guard. And why all this—The Meister wished it—The Meister who had a bridge expressly built from the stage to the orchestra and the house, is very much irritated, he scolds everyone, even his best artists. These, artists, who kneel down, before the autority of the meister take these scoldings very Calmly only the profan ears of the reporter must not hear his corections and advices. Through these strange proceedings no one knows, what is going on and the advance of the Festivalplay. Every storry comes out through third hand, disfigured and no one knows realy the truth of the proceedings. Tuesday the 25th being the end of all stage rehearsal, Wagner gives a Garden Fete for all his artists and Liszt will be amongst them. It is very uncertain wether Vogl will appear. The King of Bavaria has his Separat-Performance on the 27th. * * * *

BAYREUTH JULY 25.—The last stage rehearsal in full costume of Parsifal, took place on Monday the 24 and lasted from 4 till 9.52, and went off most successfully. All the artists did their best. The scenery of Herr Brandt worked wonderfully. Astounding was the wandering scene from the lovely forest scene to the Gral sanctuary (Gralls-Lisligthum). At the end the Orchestra gave Wagner an ovation. He spoke—He thanked the members for their devotion and said "Parsifal is the last word I have spoken." Kappelmeister Levy conducted. Bayreuth is full with celebrities and Reporters, amongst the many foreign Princes is the Duke of Edinburgh.—L.

I have had a hard struggle, but I have fought against all difficulties. I have conquered, I have created "Parsifal" and you will judge my work, I have not forgotten the one friend that enabled me to write and I thank you for your zeal and ardour—Banquir Feustel proposed Wagners health Also Liszt's health was proposed and Wagner said, he has taken me in hand when I still was a poor "Mosje" but since we are friends his praise is my satisfaction. After waiting one hour for the second course the Dinner was over—At the end Wagner said—To morrow, the Devil is loose "Morgen geht der Teufel los" if you don't all get mad, zerückt—I have not had a successful day Of course the whole Chorus screemed of delight and promised to do so—

The first performance of Parsifal is over—what we know of it by the Pianoforte score and the book has now gone over the stage—Wagner has made a grip at the catholic church and has reveeled the secret of the sacriment, and made the penittence (Entsagung) a stage piece, With a bold hand he has seized a few persons of the Old proenealish myth, of the Parzival, taken a vizion and images from the christian revelations, and so composed a plot for his new work.

CONCERTS.

THE London Conservatoire of Music, under the direction of its principal (Mr Lansdowne Cottell), gave a grand concert at the Alexandra Palace on Saturday, July 22, before a large and appreciative audience, who enjoyed the admirable selection of music performed by the clever students. The Conservatoire, the only institution in this country where training is conducted upon the Continental system, affords amateur and professional alike the opportunity of obtaining at nominal terms a thorough and practical musical education from the most eminent London and Continental teachers, and affords direct facilities to young artistes studying for the profession. The Continental system is well known to be essentially practical, and we wish the institution every success. Judging from the performance and the applause on Saturday, we have no doubt that its operations at the present time are doing a great deal of good.—The Citizen.

M. DE NEVERS, a Russian pianist of ability, gave a matinée at the residence of Colonel Elrington, Princes Gate, on Tuesday afternoon, July 18, playing with considerable effect arrangements of Russian and Bohemian airs, added to a pianoforte duet, in which his fellow-pianist was Signor Samuelli. Mrs Elrington, an amateur of high attainments, gave Oberthür's fantasia on airs from Robert le Diable; and Miss Elrington selected the fifth Polonaise of Chopin. The singers were Mdme Barri and Mdlle Desvignes; MM. Odoardo Barri, Gandy, Zamboni, &c. The concert was fashionably attended, and gave general satisfaction.

A "RECITAL" of Mr Nicholas Mori's new comic opera, The Shipwright's Love (libretto by Mr Wellington Guernsey), was given at Chichester Place, on Wednesday, the 26th ult., before a large and appreciative audience, whose favourable verdict may not improbably lead to its production at one of the numerous theatres devoted to this now popular style of composition. The music, thoroughly English in character, was effectively rendered by Misses Foresta and Cossford, Messrs Broughton, Roney, Birch, Quick, and Ainsworth, the composer (Mr Nicholas Mori) presiding at the pianoforte. The scene is laid at Falmouth, and the plot was found highly amusing. Author and composer were called for at the end and warmly applauded.

Mr Sanders gave his Evening Concert at the Beethoven Rooms, Harley Street, on the 27th July. The celebrated Trumpet player, Mr T. Harper, performed in his usually splendid style—The "Exile's Lament" (Albert) is a lovely composition—Mr Harper played it as only Mr Harper can—such glorious Tone, so finished, breathing such a spirit of Music—Englishmen have to be proud of such a Man. The new song (M.S.) "The Brave Old Victory"—Words and Music by Mr Sanders, sung by Mr Frank Holmes, and accompanied by Mr W. H. Holmes—told remarkably well it was rapturously encored.—It is thoroughly English—which is saying a great deal—highly dramatic and truthful—Mr Frank Holmes sang the song with great attention to light and shade—and gave great satisfaction—Mr W. H. Holmes (who has not appeared in Public for some time) was twice encored—once—in "Bitter Sweet"—a Fragment by Miss Sydney Gardiner—It is a lovely Composition—and was rapturously encored—Mr W. H. Holmes played his Caprice "Auld lang syne," and on being encored gave his "Scottish Chimes." Miss Edith Collins quite charmed by her performance of Polonaise, Chopin, and solo, "Storm Rondo" Steibelt and in a beautiful duet by Walter Macfarren played by Miss Edith Collins and R. W. Buttery, with great effect. There was some charming Vocal Music by Miss Grace Woodward, Miss Jessie Royd; also by Mr Dison. The concert seemed to give general satisfaction.—(From an occasional contributor.)

PROVINCIAL.

Abergavenny.—At the Musical Eisteddfod to be held on Monday, August 7th, a prize of £100 is awarded for the best choral singing, and prizes of £25 for madrigal and part-song, Mr Brinley Richards being "Principal Adjudicator." The Eisteddfod is under the patronage of the Marquis of Abergavenny, Lord Aberdare, the High Sheriff of Monmouthshire, &c. Each of the choirs must consist of at least 150 voices, and eight have already declared themselves competitors. The meeting has created much excitement in South Wales, and a large attendance is expected.

Hereford.—The preliminary programme of the 159th "Festival of the Three Choirs" of Worcester, Hereford, and Gloucester is out. The principal artists engaged are Mesdames Albani and Patey, Misses Marian Fenner, Anna Williams, and Hilda Wilson, Messrs Edward Lloyd, C. W. Fredericks, Boyle, King, and Santley. Mr J. T. Carrodus is leader of the band. The Festival begins on the 11th prox. Mendelssohn's Elijah, selections from Handel's Judas Maccabæus, Beethoven's symphony No. 4, the 137th psalm by Goetz, Bach's Magnificat in D, Mendelssohn's St Paul, G. M. Garrett's new oratorio The Shunammite (conducted by the composer), Beethoven's Mass in C, a selection from Molique's Abraham, and Handel's Messiah are among the leading features of a rich and varied programme. There will be secular concerts at the Shire Hall on Tuesday, Thursday, and Friday evenings, chiefly of a miscellaneous character, but including, among other interesting items, an Ode to the Passions, by Mrs Meadows White, and Beethoven's Choral Fantasia.

Norwich.—The last for the present season of the St Andrew's Hall Organ Recitals was given on Saturday afternoon, July 29, by Dr Bunnett, in the presence of a large audience—the hall being well nigh filled. When we mention the organist's name, it is needless to say that the varied programme was carried out effectively, and proved a real musical treat. At the conclusion the Sheriff (J. J. Winter, Esq.) moved a resolution expressing to Dr Bunnett the great pleasure and enjoyment which had been afforded by these recitals, and in doing so the speaker alluded with satisfaction to the fact that above 5,000 persons had attended them during the series. The worthy doctor's arrangement of the programmes, his selection of music of the highest order, by which the popular taste must be elevated, and his masterly performances on this noble instrument deserved their sincere and hearty recognition. The proposition was warmly seconded by E. K. Harvey, Esq., and agreed to with acclamation.—Eastern Daily Press.

Birmingham Festival.—The performance of the new cantata, Psyche, by the Danish composer, Niels Gade, of which the Princess of Wales has accepted the dedication, is fixed for August 31st. A London performance is fixed for December 12 at St James's Hall. Mdme Marie Roze has been specially engaged by the committees to sing the part of "Psyche" on each occasion, and it is expected that the Prince and Princess of Wales will honour both by their presence, in compliment to the Danish composer, who will conduct his work in person.—(Communicated.)

Leeds.—"The Town Council and Dr Spark have, after many years' perseverance, brought the Town Hall Concerts to a successful issue. On Saturday night, July 29, the Victoria Hall was crowded, and the audience thoroughly enjoyed the excellent programme which had been provided. The following remarks were appended to the programme by Dr. Spark:—'The Corporation regard these Free Organ Recitals from an educational point of view, and the great personal interest the Corporate Property Committee take in their realization and success is a matter of great gratification to us all—musicians and people. It is calculated that not fewer than sixty thousand persons have attended the performances just ended, to listen—and listen the audience always does most attentively—to nearly four hundred pieces I have had the honour to play during this session. I hope to resume the recitals early in September, of which due notice will be given.'"—Leeds Express, July 31.

A SOP FOR THE "ADVANCED."

"Avancé Hercule!"
(Avance et recule.)
(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

Sir,—The programme of the Hereford Festival this year is varied and good. Nevertheless, members of the "Advanced" will be shocked at finding not only Mendelssohn's Elijah, but Mendelssohn's St Paul set down. "Are you going to ——?"—said (in my hearing) an honest, straightforward every-day "Musiker" (not "Musikant") to one of the most advanced among the too tooer tooest apostles of the Weimarian and Bayreuthian teachings. "What?"—retorted the fiercely placid Weimar-Bayreuthian—"go all that way to hear Elijah?—not if I know it!"

The Shunammite, however, of Dr Garrett, a red-hot Wagnerian, will, on Thursday, prove an irresistible temptation to the "Advanced," who will swallow it with extreme relish, and leave the Cathedral time enough to escape Beethoven's Mass in C. Of course, after "the interval of one hour," they will return for the selections from Molique's Abraham, and in the evening rush impetuously to Shire Hall, where an exceptional programme of music, vocal and instrumental, awaits them, every item of which they will hungrily and thirstily consume. With drawn swords they will then set out zu fuss for Bayreuth, lest, in their absence, Kundry, prevailing over Parsifal, should help to establish Klingsor as "King of the Graal."—I am, Sir, with courtesy,

Your Special Fanatic.

In Seville doth the story go
('Tis said 'tis not so long ago)
A count, a high grandee of Spain,
And one who ne'er had wooed in vain,
In wedlock sought a gipsy maid.
"Noble Sir," she laughing said,
"What sort of countess should I be?
I lose the tent, the greenwood free,
The moon, the starlit heaven above,
Gitana's song, and Julio's love.

"Your palace I should prison find,
Your jewels chains my feet to bind,
My simple ways your friends would scorn,
I in my grandeur be forlorn.
You'd learn to hate some day, I fear,
The Buane girl you once held dear.
Choose one, Sir Count, of your degree,
The greenwood mine, and liberty;
Yes, give me the blue heaven above,
Gitana's song and Julio's love."

Mr Boucicault's address upon acting at the Lyceum Theatre dealt with few topics upon which criticism has not already spoken. His technical illustrations were amusing, and belonged, of course, to a province outside the domain of criticism. In what was of most importance, however, in the protest against the "vanity-sickness" that impedes an actor, against the indifference and inattention with which the spectators of a supposed action regard what should curdle their blood, and in other kindred matters, he lent the weight of his name and talent to views that have found constant advocacy in the Athenæum. For such support we are naturally thankful. It is possible that the conditions under which Mr Boucicault spoke may lend weight to his words, and that the fact that a large portion of his audience was made up of actors may render his speech profitable. Mr Boucicault's method is, at least, perfect, and his lecture was an artistic as well as an intellectual treat.—J. K.

MR IRVING'S FAREWELL SPEECH.

Lyceum, Saturday, July 29.

The curtain has fallen upon Romeo and Juliet for the 130th time, and I hope you will permit it on September 2nd, this day five weeks, to rise again upon the play presented to-night. I am told sometimes that I do wrong to inflict on you the tediousness of Shakspere, an author whose works some of the wise judges of dramatic art assure us are rather dull and tiresome to a nineteenth-century audience. Perhaps Shakspere would find some of us a little dull and tiresome, too; but, be that as it may, I fear I shall continue in my misguided course as I shall meet with your support to warrant my perseverance, and, for those who find his works dull and tedious, we shall be happy to put them on the free list when you are kind enough to leave room for them. I am glad to tell you that the season just past has realized nothing but success. We began with The Two Roses, which you received with great favour, and which was played until the production of Romeo and Juliet. Romeo and Juliet was no light undertaking, and it is, perhaps, worth recording that, out of twenty characters, more or less, in the play, not one of them had ever been attempted by any of us before; so that to each actor in the cast it was a first night's representation. This, in a Shakspere play, is somewhat remarkable, and difficult beyond belief to all who know the difficulties under which actors labour on their first appearances in what are called legitimate parts. Every part has been acted before—hundreds and, perhaps, thousands of times before—and various standards of opinions have been formed and volumes probably written upon them. It is a common thing to hear an actor say, "Ah, give me an original part," meaning a part that cannot be judged by precedent. It was thought by some, I remember, that I had overdone our play with scenery and trappings, and that I had spent too much upon its production. That I don't dispute, but that it was overdone—I do. Nothing, to my mind, can be overdone upon the stage that is beautiful—I mean correct and harmonious, and that heightens, not dwarfs, the imagination and reality. I took no less comparative pains in producing The Captain of the Watch or The Two Roses. The next play—and I must again inflict upon you the tediousness of Shakspere*—the next play which we shall have the honour of presenting will be Much Ado about Nothing, the cast of which will be the best I can by every possibility command. What our next venture may be after that I can hardly now say, for, like a good skipper, I must closely watch the breeze of your desire, and trim my sails accordingly. On behalf of the Lyceum company I must thank you for the manifold kindnesses you have shown, and I must especially thank you on behalf of Mrs Stirling, whose performance of the Nurse will, I am sure, be long remembered by you, and on behalf of Miss Ellen Terry. To play the part of Juliet 130 consecutive times, and never to have faltered, is an effort calling forth an energy both of brain and soul—a feat of physical endurance not often accomplished, and seldom, I am glad to say, if ever, required of an artist. You will perhaps say, "Then why require it?" Ladies and gentlemen, "Those who live to please must please to live." Success cannot be commanded in theatrical matters. If you like the presentment of a play you will come and see it; if you don't like it you will stay away, and if you do come and see it in goodly numbers it is a manager's duty to continue it. "While you have success keep it," should be the motto of the manager of a big theatre, for sympathy without success will soon shut up his theatre. For myself, whilst thanking you for the brilliant attendance with which you have honoured me to-night (another proof of your favour), I have a confession to make which lies heavy upon my breast, for if I am to credit a certain authority I have grievously offended you. It seems I have been guilty of sanctioning a custom more honoured in the breach that the observance—the custom of what is called taking a "benefit." Benefits, it appears, should never be taken, should be forgot, at least by actors whom your favour has cherished with prosperity and honour. Now, I beg to differ from this view, and having the respect and honour of my calling thoroughly and seriously at heart, would not forget the old custom. Ladies and gentlemen, few of you, I daresay, have come here to-night with the impression that your money will be welcome to an impoverished treasury. It is not to put money in my purse or to take it out of yours that I cling to the old custom. But I cannot deny myself at the end of each season the gratification of reading in your kindly faces that approbation which I deserve so imperfectly, but which, believe me, I value so highly. Thanks for your generous favour, every night is a benefit or otherwise to me as a manager, but on occasions like this I come forward—and I am not ashamed to do so, as many great masters of my art have done so before me—to take a special benefit, the benefit of seeing around me many of my best and well-tried friends—best and well-tried because throughout my career, through all my struggles, through my failures and successes, they have succoured me with their hearty sympathy and cheered me with their ungrudging encouragement. Ladies and gentlemen, I thank you with all my heart, and wish you but for a little time "Good-bye," and I hope I shall never be guilty of worse taste or greater vulgarity than in appearing before you as I do to-night; and whether it may be called a benefit or by any other name, I shall be proud of the occasion which can gather together such a distinguished assembly as have honoured me with their presence to-night.

SOME HINTS FOR MUSICAL NOTEBOOKISTS.

SIR.—Halévy's family name was Lévy. Wagner knew this full well, and whenever he fell over the composer of La Juive, at the corner of Louis-le-grand Street (which was seldom), he escaped without injury. He used to say, "Ha, Lévy!"—and Halévy let him pass, with a "Pardon, Monsieur." I speak of 1840, or thereabouts, when, at the request of Maurice Schlésinger, Wagner arranged Guido et Genevra for five flutes and three shawms, which latter he would playfully designate as "Shem, Ham, and Japhet" (before his treatise, Judaism in Music, had seen the light of day), and for the same spirited, though a thought lymphatic, undertaker, wrote puffs extraordinary on the operas of Meyerbeer and Halévy in general. These puffs are extant. If you like, I will send them, under cover, to Dr Septimus Wind, who will blow them open and reveal their contents.

In 1851, I should add that Mr Shaver Silver fell over both Halévy and Wagner at the same corner of Louis-le-grand Street, but, happily, with no loss to life or even limb. Mr Silver was then writing his first Life of Rossini, suggested to him by Charles Lamb Kenney and Pierre Dupont. This was the year of the Coup d'Etat (State-blow), which Shaver was sent specially to witness, after it was over—accompanied by Gus Mayhew and Bob Brough, who, Vivier and Taxile Delord, the Charivarist, notwithstanding, had no more to do with that Coup than Clement White (an Irish minstrel of their gang). But residing in the "Quartier Latin," over and athwart the Pont Neuf, they were suspected of Jules Janin, who lived at No. 22, Rue Vaugirard (Vau-Girard! Hence "Whoa-Emma!"), and was not easily put out of his conceit. "All this gorgeous company of wits" (Childe Harold—no, Leveson Gower) are gone! except Eugène Vivier and the writer of this lame epistle, your faithless and obedient, SAMUEL TOPER TABLE.

DEVONSHIRE MUSIC.

The following are extracts from notices of recent musical doings at Taunton, which the spirited example set by its foremost professor, Mr Dudeney, is fast creating another musical town.

* * * * * * *

The principal added that he was particularly pleased with the progress the scholars had made in music, and passed a warm tribute of praise to Mr Dudeney. The prizes were then distributed.

* * * * * * * *

Music prizes (given by Mr Dudeney):—1st, R. Sommerville; 2nd, H. Sommerville; 3rd, Radermacher; certificates, H. Marsden, F. Clements, A. Glanvill, and Gorton.

The concert was quite a success, the room being crowded. The programme, a somewhat lengthy one, was very well sustained throughout, the audience evincing its appreciation by repeated encores, which were not, however, responded to. The choir, with Mr Dudeney as conductor, has very much improved. Part I. opened with Sterndale Bennett's part-song, "Of all the Arts," by the choir, given in capital time. A quintet in D for flute, violins, viola, and violoncello, admirably played by Messrs M. Rowe (whose manipulation of the flute was perfect), Allen, H. Radermacher, Dudeney, and R. Somerville, and was very deservedly applauded. A decidedly clever composition, entitled "The events of the year," by "an old boy and a young girl," was given by A. Gorton. The feature of the first part was the Greek drama, Antigone, by Sophocles, the vocal parts by W. P. Balfern, A. Cornish, A. Griffith, and R. Savery. This was very creditably carried out. The incidental* music by Mendelssohn was given with effect by the choir and orchestra. The air, "I will love thee," from Bennett's Woman of Samaria, was given by T. R. Glanvill, who possesses a voice of remarkable sweetness.

* * * * * * * *

Macfarren's "The Brothers," given by T. R. Glanvill and F. Stevens, was vociferously encored, but was not repeated. The concert concluded with an epilogue, delivered by a small boy, named B. Colthurst, who was warmly applauded. The concert passed off in a satisfactory manner, and too great praise cannot be given to Mr Dudeney for his excellent management.

SOME NOT IRRELEVANT QUERIES.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—Will some one of your numerous readers kindly enlighten me on the following questions?

1. Why should not the munificently inclined endow the Royal Academy of Music with the means for granting free instruction and maintenance to those whose abundance of talent and lack of means appear to entitle them to it?

2. Why is it to be supposed that musical genius should only be sought for among the most impecunious classes?

3. Is musical genius a lower sort of gift than literary or poetic inspiration? Quite as many great writers and poets have belonged to the higher and wealthier classes as to the poorer.

4. Why should not the wealthier classes spend more intelligence on the study of music, and thereby have some judgment of their own, instead of deafly following any prevalent craze.

5. Why should not musical distinction be as much attained by the self-devotion of those who can pay for instruction as of those who cannot? Mendelssohn and Meyerbeer belonged to wealthy families, and yet were not content to remain merely amateurs.

Yours faithfully, ENQUIRER.

BAYREUTH (correspondence).—The first performance of Parsifal took place on the 25th ult. The leading characters were sustained by Materna (Kundry), Winkelmann (Parsifal), Scaria (Gurnemanz), Reichmann (Amfortas), Hill (Klingsor), and Kindermann (Titurel). Herr Levy of the Theatre Royal, Munich, conducted. The curtain rose for the first act at 4 p.m. and fell at 5.30. The second act commenced at 7 and terminated at 8.15. After the third act, there was a call for Wagner, who made a short speech, in which he particularly thanked all who had taken part in the performance. The Grand-Duke of Saxe-Weimar and the Prince of Hesse were among the audience. The French contingent included MM. Saint-Saëns, Délibes, Salvayre, Charles Lamoureux, Francis Planté, Fischer the violoncellist, and many others.—The papers supply some financial details respecting the Parsifal performances. King Ludwig of Bavaria will satisfy the claims of the vocal artists, orchestra, and other persons from the Theatre Royal, Munich; he will pay 60,000 marks to the dancers alone. But the large additions which had to be made to the numerical strength of the company—for the orchestra has been increased from 70 to 110 members, and a grand total of some 300 persons is engaged in the performance—necessitates an extra sum of 84,000 marks for the singers, which the managing committee will have to provide. Only Marianne Brandt sings without pecuniary remuneration. Mdme Materna receives 6,000 marks, and Herr Scaria 6,300.

* If the music to Antigone be "incidental," let all music henceforth be incidental.—Otto Beard.

"Messrs Duncan Davison & Co. (Regent Street) send us several ballads, but none that can be said to approach in sweetness and charm 'The Poet's Song,' words by Tennyson, music by Hope Temple. There is merit of a very palpable kind in this effort, which betrays the complete affinity between musician and poet that is so essential for a due rendering of justice by one to the other. The melody is suave, expressive, and, above all, original; its harmonies are uncommon and interesting, while the full yet simple accompaniment assists the voice without, as is too often the case, usurping the effect that should rightly be left for the singer to obtain. We have devoted more than a passing word to 'The Poet's Song,' because we regard it as superior to the ordinary run of 'pot-boilers.' It should become popular with amateurs who know how to appreciate a really good ballad."—Sunday Times.

"Messrs Boosey & Co. have done good service not only to amateurs but to art, by including in their series of volumes of national melodies 'The Songs of Scandinavia' and 'The Songs of Eastern Europe.' The first-named contains eighty-three examples; and the second, a hundred. We need not insist upon the importance of collections like these, whatever the country they represent; but we must say that no musical library is complete without the songs of Scandinavia and Eastern Europe. The editor, Mr J. A. Kappey, has taken great pains to secure melodies of a genuinely representative character, and at a time when attention is becoming more and more directed to folk-tunes as a source of new thematic ideas, the volumes in question are of peculiar value. They have our most hearty commendation, the 'Songs of Eastern Europe' more especially, since the volume contains, besides examples of Liszt, Chopin, and other masters, a very valuable collection of volkslieder from the hitherto untouched wealth of the Austrian provinces."—Daily Telegraph.

"Messrs Boosey & Co. have published two additional volumes of their National Songs, which appear likely to be the most interesting of the series. We know little of the rich repertory of Scandinavian Songs, and Mr and Miss Kappey, the editors of these books, are to be thanked for introducing some of the best specimens to public notice. Five of the Russian songs are so old as to be traditional; and in the series are to be found a beautiful Cossack lullaby by one Bachmetieff, a gipsy song by Lvoff, and several songs by Warlamoff. These and the Polish songs (all of which are traditional) may be considered among the most interesting items of a small but acceptable collection. Two ancient Lithuanian songs, a couple of Finnish, and four ancient Norwegian melodies, will likewise be found in the book. The majority of the Swedish songs are by Lindblad, that prolific song writer, who died in 1864. Tradition says that the old melody of 'The Beggar Boy' was once sung in the days when she was a poor child by the distinguished artist now known as Mdme Christine Nilsson. Included in the Danish songs is the traditional 'Dannebrog,' the music of which is attributed to one 'Bay.' It would be interesting to inquire the foundation for this statement, as the origin of the Danish National Anthem was generally understood to be unknown. The tradition of the 'Dannebrog Banner,' which, in 1719, fell down from heaven to bring victory to the Danish arms, is duly recorded in a footnote. Most of the Dutch songs given date back to the sixteenth century; and there are besides three songs by W. F. G. Nicolai, and one Flemish song. Altogether eighty-three of the national songs of northern Europe are included in this valuable and interesting book. In future editions a larger preface or more footnotes, giving further particulars of the old songs whose history is known, would be welcome. Equally interesting are the songs of Eastern Europe, recently issued by Messrs Boosey, and likewise edited by Mr and Miss Kappey. Among the thirty-four Austrian songs, the large majority are volkslieder, and they include Tyrolean, Styrian, and Polish songs, two of them by Chopin. These are followed by twenty-three characteristic specimens of Hungarian songs, giving a very fair idea of the peculiarities of Hungarian music, and comprising modern songs by Liszt, and some traditional songs of Bosnia, Moravia, and Dalmatia. The first of the Bohemian songs is the 'War-song of the Hussites,' once, it is believed, the national song of the country. A few specimens of Servian, Swiss, Greek, and even Turkish melodies. The last are very peculiar; and the peculiar intervals common to this and other Eastern music are claimed by some to have been handed down direct from the music of the ancient Hebrews."—Figaro.

FOR THE PIANOFORTE.
By
LILLIE ALBRECHT.
Price 4s.

London: DUNCAN DAVISON & Co., 244, Regent Street, W.

"'Fantaisie Marziale' is the title of Miss Lillie Albrecht's latest addition to her already numerous list of Morceaux de Salon for the pianoforte. This young lady writes for her instrument almost as well as she performs upon it, and her compositions are invariably characterised by elegance and brilliancy. The present piece is no exception to the rule, but manifests in some respects an advancement in mastery of device and effect that justifies us in encouraging Miss Albrecht to persevere until she can undertake even more weighty tasks. The 'Fantaisie Marziale' comes well within the reach of the ordinary player."—Sunday Times.

"There is an ample supply of dash and spirit in Lillie Albrecht's 'Fantaisie Marziale.'"—Graphic.

"Next I would call attention to the brilliant and effective pianoforte piece recently published by the popular young pianist, Miss Lillie Albrecht, a 'Fantaisie Marziale,' a work that will be found acceptable by all who wish to possess facile and bright pieces. It is my duty no less than my pleasure to encourage ladies in all their artistic efforts."—Lady's Pictorial.

"Miss Albrecht is not only a pianist of remarkable power and ability, but a composer of very elegant music for her 'instrument de prédilection.' This spirited 'Martial Fantasia,' in G major, boldly asserts its title, and is indeed a stirring effusion, that might be made effective, in score, for a military band. The piece is no child's play, but will require study. The staccato octave passages alone supply work for fire-eating players."—"Musical Standard," May, 1882.

"Harry Croft Hiller is both poet and musician, as shown by five songs, for which he has supplied both words and music. Prettiest of the group is a serenade for a tenor, 'Sweetest slumber now await thee,' which, if sung well, will make a great and favourable impression during the coming out-door season. 'Thy Dear Name' and 'In the Haven' are tender and touching songs, also for tenor voices; the latter is the better and more original of the two. More dashing and spirited are 'The Border Raider,' for a bass voice, and 'The Queen's Shilling,' for a baritone."—Graphic.

"Three songs by Harry Croft Hiller deserve praise, inasmuch as the composer has been successful in writing his own words rather prettily. We like best the serenade, 'Sweetest slumber now await thee.'"—Sunday Times.

For invigorating and enriching the voice, and removing affections of the throat.

DR STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE is universally acknowledged to be the most valuable remedy for sore throat, hoarseness and relaxed throat. It should always be taken before singing or reciting, as it strengthens the vocal organs. It is most extensively prescribed by the faculty for the throat and voice. Dr Lewis, of Basingstoke, says he finds them most efficacious, and in Dr Copland's Dictionary of Practical Medicine (Longman & Co.), they are strongly recommended at pages 872 and 1492. They are used by all the greatest vocalists and orators in Europe, and have been established over a quarter of a century. Testimonials from Patti, Grisi, Lablache, Santley, &c. A MUSICAL PILGRIMAGE.

(From the "Daily Telegraph.")

After six years, I am again resting—no, not exactly resting—beneath the shadow of Richard Wagner's Wohnhaus, and within an easy march, along a road less dusty now than I have known it, of his Festival Theatre. The musical pilgrim, whatever his creed and favourite shrine, must needs set his face towards Bayreuth at the present moment. Curiosity, if nothing else, drags him thither, or, it may be, hope of cause for the good, hearty anathema which, despite a familiar Latin quotation, continues to relieve even celestial minds. Whatever the feeling in my own case, it must be a strong one, since my recollections of Bayreuth in 1876 are not among those that I occasionally "scour," as do the Berkshire folk their White Horse, in order to keep the outline clear. I would fain forget the hunger and the heat, the worry and the work of a time when "all the world," in the French sense of the expression, descended upon a quiet, sleepy, out-of-the-way Bavarian town, and found a bovine population utterly unable to supply its wants. Yet, I left London the other day prepared to go through the ordeal again—though, let me confess, scarcely expectant of having to do so. "Why not expectant?" may be the query of some simple believer in what he reads of the march of Wagnerism. I admit the propriety of the question from his point of view. Six years have passed since the Nibelung's Ring was produced, and in the interval there has been much beating-up for Wagnerian recruits throughout all regions of the musical world. Take London, for example. We have scarcely got the thud of the Wagnerian drum out of our ears, and our minds are yet exercised by the harangues of here and there a Sergeant Kite. All things considered, an astonishing example of centripetal force should just now be presented at Bayreuth, wherefore our simple believer was quite justified in interrupting me with his question. But deductions and facts do not always coincide here; indeed, they are at exceeding variance. On my way to this place I found the minds of men remarkably free from pre-occupation regarding Wagner and his new work; nor was the name of Parsifal mentioned in my hearing till I encountered a German journalist at Bamberg, and he, having sworn by Beethoven and Fidelio, vowed eternal brotherhood with myself as a fellow-believer. Apropos, let me say that musical practices sufficiently unsatisfactory seemed to have established themselves along the road. While waiting for the train at Cologne I did not lounge with grooms and porters on the bridge, but, as most others, strolled into the adjacent cathedral—that marvellous monument which a thousand years have not finished, the noise of mallet and chisel breaking in even now upon chant and prayer. Some kind of service, I know not what, was going on; the priests were singing, and the organ accompanying. Let me never hear such cacophony again. The reverend fathers insisted upon a tempo rubato of the freest kind. The poor organist, high up in a gallery round a corner, had to guess at what was being done in front of the altar; and the recurring note upon which an indefinite pause came was one that half the voices failed to reach. But when the boys struck in, I was driven to think of some wounded creature in agony, since nothing more harsh and painful could be conceived. Such a service would not be tolerated for a week in an English cathedral—our "unmusical nation" having still an old-fashioned love of that which pleases the ear. I waited for the train again in the fine old city of Wurzburg, found the place en fête, and the cathedral crowded by assistants at some special religious function. Far out along the Dom Strasse came the sound of many voices, assuring me an opportunity of hearing the German chorale in a place where its traditions have certainly been preserved. If such a chance is never more mine I shall not grieve. The singing was congregational, no doubt. Every man, woman, and child joined in a mighty unison, the only fault being that the vocal pitch fell in each verse at least a semitone below that of the organ. Not a bit did this trouble the good people, they went serenely on their way, having apparently no ears to hear that which drove at least one person out of the place. A little later, the same congregation descended into the streets, accompanying with pious hymns the Host, as it was borne along under a gorgeous canopy. Curious results were produced by this itinerant and open-air song, inasmuch as the procession divided itself into sections, each singing in its own time and key. Thus was heard, for example, a melody progressing simultaneously in the keys of D and G, while, to fill up the gap, a brass band blared forth the tune in F. The remarkable thing was that the people sang on, undisturbed by the extraordinary clash of sounds; and now I do not wonder that Germany provides Wagnerian vocalists, to whom it is a matter of perfect indifference what goes on in the Wagnerian orchestra.

Bavarian trains, not excepting those humorously called "schnell," move slowly, in accord with the habits of the people, and from Wurzburg to Bayreuth was a weary journey, timed to end in the small hours of the morning. Anxiety about a lodging, however, did not survive the halt at Bamberg. The guard of the train effected a little business in the way of touting for particular hotels, and the refreshment people at the stations attempted more. Clearly, Bayreuth in 1882 was not as Bayreuth in 1876, and so I found it. What a contrast the town presented on the following dark and dreary morning to its gay and lightsome aspect during the sunny days of the "Nibelung's Ring!" Then Bayreuth put on its best and bravest; "flagged" its houses in a style that would rejoice the Mayor of Windsor's heart what time a Royal marriage happens; stripped the neighbouring fir woods of their greenery, and made an astonishing display of paper flowers. Now, one may scour the place for a visible flag—even the Master's painted villa, "Wahnfried," stands under bare poles; the fir trees moan in the melancholy wind undisturbed; while not the semblance of a bud or bloom makes mock of the sombre scene. The streets are forsaken. Vainly one looks for the eager throngs of 1876, and the inhabitants stand at their doors expecting lodgers who never come. Thus but a few features in Bayreuth remind me of the "Nibelung" days. Accommodation is indifferent and food bad, as a matter of course. That supplies one connecting link, and another is the appearance—in diminished numbers, truly—of flapping head-gear, long hair, spectacled faces, and the mysterious look which has been happily described as gazing "intensely nowhere." These are signs of devotion to Wagnerian culture, and I always regard them with the interest due to genuine enthusiasm in our somewhat flabby days. Only, as it is sometimes my fate to sit at table near an enthusiast, I wish that Wagnerian culture included clean finger-nails, and forbade using the knife where, as a rule, we "Philistines" make the fork serve. That, however, is a detail.

Another bond of union between the time present and the time six years past may be observed in the shop windows, which again remind lookers-on that they are in the vicinity of a shrine. Bayreuth appears to assume that every visitor will take home with him an effigy of the Master. You can have the Master in various sorts of base metal; he is to be purchased, medallion or bust, in plaster; and it would be quite easy to obtain him in marble, with, perhaps, the real laurel-wreath thrown in that now adorns his brow. Photography is prodigal of the Master and all his belongings. It showers him upon us in unnumbered styles and positions, enables us to penetrate the walls of "Wahnfried," and even to peep into the laboratory where the wizard, in wonderful attire, weaves his spells and compounds his nostrums. Nor is this all, by much. You can wear Parsifal shawls, and put round your neck a Kundry cravat, while as for Wagnerian books it would be possible to fill with them an ordinary library. All the Master's littérateurs, from Hans von Wolzogen downwards, have fastened upon Parsifal. One can fancy how they waited, pen in hand, for this new utterance of their oracle; some to expound the enigmatical; others to follow the trace of the finished work back to its primitive sources; others to analyse and classify; others to do the safer and less troublesome trumpeting. Truly, if we do not understand Wagner, it can hardly be for lack of interpreters, and the only question that arises is whether a composer should need such a jabber of explanatory tongues. Admitting this question as pertinent, a philanthropic mind can discover consolation in the fact that Wagner gives a good deal of employment. He has created not only a "new art" but a new industry, and "Wagner-expounder" should have a distinct place in the directory under the head "Trades and professions."

After what I have said regarding the Festival town it will surprise no one to learn that yesterday morning I had a choice of places in the Festival theatre. An obliging ticket clerk made various graceful curves with his pencil upon the plan, and intimated that all seats within their scope were at my disposal. This, it should be remembered, was for only the second public performance, the first representations having been restricted to those faithful disciples who deserved a place at the Master's table, instead of hanging about to pick up fallen crumbs. Altogether I concluded that there was no great run upon the crumbs, and the fact turned out to be even so, the sides of the theatre presenting last night a disquieting array of empty benches. We were a melancholy band as we wended along the well-remembered road leading to the scene of operations. Overhead, dense clouds promised another downpour to deepen the mud under foot, and they kept their word; across the reeking country blew a dank and moaning wind; there was a chill around everything, and a depression that seemed to creep into the soul through the channel of each sense. I did not then realize to the fullest extent the fitness of this as prelude to one of the most painful dramas ever put upon the stage; but I estimated completely the characteristic course pursued by Herr Wagner in making access to his temple an almost certain matter of discomfort and difficulty. He doubtless had his reasons, and may have recognized a personal triumph last night, as between the acts he saw damp devotees and the rest trying to cheer themselves with Bavarian beer and Bayreuthian victuals. Wagner was present, of course, and had a seat in the Princes' Gallery—not a conspicuous seat, nor one altogether obscure, for the audience soon found him out, and turned upon him the admiring glare of a thousand spectacles. This personal homage became more demonstrative after the second act. There were loud shouts of "Hoch" and "Bravo" till the Master, who is never more than prudently coy on such occasions, came to the front of his box, and amid dead silence spoke a few words which, to the majority present, were inaudible. By his side was the ever faithful Liszt, looking much aged since 1876, but no less picturesque and striking than of yore; while around him fluttered a bevy of fair young women eager for a smile or a word. So far, certainly, the great virtuoso was Parsifal in Klingsor's "rose-garden of girls," and, after his courtly fashion, may have said, with that hero, "I've seen nowhere yet beings so bright." The performance was attended by the usual Wagnerian conditions—semi-darkness and complete silence in the auditorium. Hardly a sound disturbed the music; no one came in late, and no one departed early. More than this, after the first act, which closes with an observance of the Lord's Supper by the Knights of the Holy Grail, all rose and left the theatre as silently as though the place were a church, the only sounds heard being those of imperfectly suppressed emotion. Every true lover of lyric drama must rejoice in such demonstrations of a thoroughly earnest, artistic spirit. Here we rise above the conflict of schools and the clash of opposing convictions into a serener region, like the peaceful woods around the Castle of the Grail, where no weapon was ever drawn, and there we are all of one mind in desiring that the magnificent form of art known as opera might as a form of art be regarded, and not as a frivolous function, whose divinity is a prima donna, and whose end is pastime. The performance of Parsifal, generally speaking, was very excellent, the only serious drawbacks being such as were almost inevitable under the conditions imposed by Wagner. On this matter, however, remark will be more opportunely made when I come to consider the work itself. Let me now pay a deserved tribute to the highly artistic labours of Fräulein Brandt (Kundry) and Herr Hill (Klingsor)—both well known in London, and also to the admirable services of Herr Reichmann (Amfortas) and Herr Sehr (Gurnemanz). The orchestra, if not quite up to the standard of that in 1876, fell very little short of it, while the chorus, which had to sing under unusual difficulties, only failed where censure could be unjust. But no merit in execution can change the nature of Parsifal, which nature is painful indeed; not least so in that the noble lesson of the story is degraded by circumstances, some of which are as unworthy as they are gratuitous, while others approach dangerously near to downright blasphemy, if it be blasphemy to caricature sacred things.

Aug. 4.

After Richard Wagner had written Tannhäuser and Lohengrin, and when contemplating The Nibelung's Ring, a discovery was announced in the pages of Opera and Drama. "The primitive myth," said, in effect, the author of that remarkable work, "shows us the ideal man—the purely human, free from all conventionality, whereas the Christian myth is but an adulteration, the consequence of a re-action against the religious influence which sought to annihilate the myth entirely." Wagner was, thereupon, understood by superficial judges of his character to have wholly set aside the Christian myth, this opinion being afterwards supported by the production of The Nibelung's Ring and Tristan and Isolde in a Pagan form. But when the Bayreuth master declares himself in one sense, it may be expected that he will sooner or later act in another. He is like the "untutored African," who sacrifices to his idol one day, and flogs it the next. Not a few examples were cited in these columns apropos to the recent London production of The Mastersingers of Nuremberg, but the climax has been reached in Parsifal, which, taken from a Christian myth, is made more Christian than its source. I do not say this by way of censure. Inconsistency is worthy of praise when it implies the abandonment of false principles. At the same time, Wagner's "backing and filling" scarcely become the founder of a new faith. He compromises his advocates by it, and makes them doubtful what to preach. I may be told not to trouble myself, since I am not his advocate. But his opponents are also vexed. They shoot their arrows from afar against mistaken teaching, and before the missile can reach its mark the target has turned over and presents a friendly face.

To understand aright the legend of Parsifal, it becomes necessary to go behind Wagner and look at the myth as presented by Wolfram of Eschenbach, from whose thirteenth-century poem, Parsival and Titurel, the Bayreuth master has avowedly taken most of his materials. It is said that Wagner consulted also Christian of Troyes and the Mort d'Arthur, but so far into details I need not enter, Wolfram's mystical work answering every necessary purpose. First, however, concerning the Holy Grail, which plays so conspicuous a part in both myth and drama.

As Lucifer fell from Heaven a jasper dropped out of his crown, was caught by angels, and supported in the air till Christ appeared, when it descended to the earth, and, in the form of a cup, came into the possession of Joseph of Arimathea. The cup was not only used at the institution of the Last Supper, but in it Joseph caught the blood which flowed from the Saviour's wounded side. Thenceforth it became sacred, and had the power of sustaining life. According to one tradition, no man, after the death of Christ, was found worthy to possess the holy vessel, which returned to the custody of angels, till Titurel, the son of a French king, obtained the honour by reason of humility and purity. Under divine direction Titurel built a temple for the Grail and a castle for its guardians, on Montsalvat in Biscay, and there founded an order of knights, who for their chivalry and chastity were deemed fit to protect and be sustained by the miraculous cup. Around the castle were woods impenetrable to all save those in the service of the Grail. The story of Parcival opens after Titurel, become old, has resigned the Grail Kingship into the hands of his son, Amfortas. According to Wolfram, Parcival's father was a knight-errant named Gamuhret, who died in Arabia before the boy was born. His mother, Herzeleide, thinking to keep him to herself, brought him up in a forest, quite apart from the world of men. But one day, seeing some knights in armour, the lad determined to go to King Arthur's court, and be made a knight likewise. Then, his mother, to discourage him, by buffeting and mocking, dressed him as a fool, and sent him forth on a sorry jade. After many adventures Parcival became a knight-errant, and, as he wandered about, happened on a splendid castle, where he was ushered into a great hall, and saw the lord of the place sitting in a chair, weak and ill. Presently a man entered bearing a bloody spear, which he carried round the hall, and after him came virgins with a table and two silver knives, followed by a queen, in whose hands was a lustrous cup. Thereupon the attendant knights sat down and ate, whatever they desired being furnished by the cup. Parcival was astonished at all this, but, having once been warned against inquisitiveness by an old knight named Gurnemanz, he asked no questions, and soon took his departure, meeting, on the way, his foster-sister Ligune, who informed him that the castle was the stronghold of the Grail, that the sick man was King Amfortas, and that he who asked the King about his illness, the bloody spear, and so on, would for ever be rich and blessed. Kundry, a learned woman, servant of the Grail, having told him to the same effect, Parcival waxed angry with himself and with Providence on account of the lost opportunity. He reviled God and became desperate, yet longing ever to see the Grail again. At last he met with his uncle, Trevrezent, once a Grail Knight, now a recluse, and from him learned that Amfortas had received a wound in combat for the honour of a lady whom, against the laws of the Grail, he was weak enough to love. That wound nothing could heal, nor could anything give relief, save the head of the spear which had caused it. Only when a knight accidentally came and asked about the hurt would Amfortas be whole again, but to that Knight he must then resign his crown. Such a Knight, said Trevrezent, had once appeared, but he kept silence. Parcival stayed long with his uncle, receiving instruction and rising into a higher and better life; after which he again set forth in search of the Grail. Five years went by, and he found it not. Then Kundry came to him once more with the news that he had been divinely appointed the Grail lord. With her he set out, entered the castle, healed Amfortas, and succeeded him on the throne.
